AUTHOR OF "ESSAYS, BIOGRAPHICAL, CRITICAL, AND MISCELLANEOUS," ETC.

Now we look upon Christianity not as a power which has sprung up out of the hidden depths of man's nature, but as one which descended from above, when heaven opened itself anew to man's long alienated race; a power which, as both in its origin and its essence it is exalted above all that human nature can create out of its own resources, was designed to impart to that nature a new life and to change it in its inmost principles.—NEANDER.

CONCLUSION.

PREFATORY NOTE:

GENIUS AND INFLUENCE OF CARLYLE.

THE main object aimed at in the present volume is sufficiently indicated in the introductory remarks. It is therefore unnecessary to reprint the preface in which its scope and occasion were formerly explained.

The issue of a new edition of the Christian Life presents a suitable opportunity for offering my thanks to those reviewers who have deemed the book worthy of public notice. My acknowledgments are due, first of all, to those who introduced it to the American public, and next to those gentlemen of the Nonconformist press of England who genially and generously recognised the efforts of one totally unknown. I cannot omit an express reference to those critics in the Patriot and Freeman newspapers who so sympathetically appreciated the aims and feelings with which I had written, and who had the boldness, very perilous with esoteric circles, to treat a subject arising out of the slighted present,—in which, nevertheless, the forces are acting, and the colours being mingled, of which our souls will retain the stamp and the hue throughout the endless future,—as equally worthy of regard with the conventional themes of erudition. The most genuine way to demonstrate my sense of obligation to my reviewers was, I suppose, to avail myself, to the best of my ability, of their advice. In deference to an opinion generally, if not unanimously, favourable, I have left the biographies almost entirely untouched. The argumentative portion has been subjected to very careful revision ; the statements advanced, and the quotations made, have been scrupulously verified. The theoretical and practical parts of the work have been more distinctly separated, and the whole arranged in two broad divisions. The atheistic, pantheistic, and Christian theories of man's duty and destiny are thus discussed in a single consecutive view. The reasoning has been throughout simplified, and in some instances supplemented ; but no leading position has been abandoned, or essentially modified. I am indebted, however, to the Rev. J. B. Paton, my critic in the Eclectic Review, for a suggestion which has enabled me to set part of the argument against pantheism in a stronger and clearer form.

But my principal object in this Note is to discharge a duty which the remarks of many of my reviewers, the hints of certain Christian friends, and still more my own reflections, have pressed upon me. A sense of perplexity, a dubious, uneasy feeling, has been experienced in many quarters touching my mode of allusion to Mr Carlyle. No disguise had been thrown over my admiration for his genius ; yet it was no more disguised that Mr Carlyle is not a believer in the Christian Revelation ; and in the religion of Christ I professed to find the only adequate and rational source of healing or hope for mankind. How could sympathy be expressed when divergence was so wide and irreconcilable ? Was it safe to render applause when so fearful a qualification had to be made ? To such questions I have felt bound to return an answer. Besides, if there is even a possibility that the apprehensions they indicate have ground in reality,—if any words of mine can have a tendency to set young minds on the path of temptation, and to dispose them favourably towards "instruction which causeth to err from the ways of understanding,"—the matter must be to me of terrible personal concern. In the present edition I have been able, I think, to set in clearer contrast than formerly what I regard as good and serviceable, and what I deem evil and pernicious, in the works of Mr Carlyle ; but I am not certain that nothing more is necessary. In this Note, therefore, without any thought of an exhaustive critique on Mr Carlyle and his writings, I shall attempt briefly to point out, first, certain qualities of his genius which render his rejection of Christianity to some extent accountable, but void of even a show of authority ; next, what contributions may be safely accepted from him to intellectual, and even moral progress ; and, thirdly, how potent the error of preferring, at the crisis of his moral and intellectual history, the vague sublimity of the pantheist to the divine simplicity of Christ, has been to injure and derange the action of his intellect.

The key to an exact intelligence of Mr Carlyle's intellectual faculty, and to a correct valuation of his writings, is a clear apprehension of the fact that his genius is of the imaginative, as distinguished from the scientific, order. He is a great artist, the instruments of his art being words. Had his works been in metrical form, he would have been secure of recognition as one of the chief poets of the century. This initial and fundamental position must be put beyond all doubt.

It is characteristic of the scientific mind that it contemplates proposition after proposition, regards each with placid equanimity, and passes in clear indifference from one to another. With the imaginative mind it is far otherwise. An idea, once embraced, is dwelt upon with intensifying, exaggerating, inflaming power. The prismatic brilliancies of fancy cluster round it ; the fusing fires of imagination melt and mould it : its exact outline is lost. There may have been poets whose capacity was to see a thing, vividly indeed, yet with photographic precision. In certain of his imaginative moods, though not in his highest, Shakspeare exhibits this species of imaginative vision. But Shakspeare's own reference to the fine frenzy of the poet shows how he understood the poetic character. And Mr Carlyle is a poet in the most express and emphatic sense. Whatever he beholds takes character and colour from an imaginative medium. He sees a "flame-image" of the thing, not the thing itself. His eye is an instrument between a burning-glass and a telescope.

The intelligent student of Mr Carlyle's works will be able to recall any number of passages in which the faculty exerted is purely imaginative. The two illustrations which follow may appear sufficiently characteristic to supply, or suggest, a complete proof that his province is that of the artist, not that of the man of science.

An exalted niche in the Carlylian temple of hero-worship is occupied by the bust of Mirabeau. "Consider," says Mr Carlyle, in his History of the French Revolution,—"consider further how, as the old Marquis still snarls, he (Mirabeau) has "made away with (humé, swallowed) all Formulas;" a fact which, if we meditate it, will in these days mean much. This is no man of system, then; he is only a man of instincts and insights. A man, nevertheless, who will glare fiercely on any object; and see through it, and conquer it: for he has intellect, he has will, force, beyond other men. A man not with logic-spectacles, but with an eye!" These words are an exact photograph from Mr Carlyle's life-size bust of Count Mirabeau. Would it not furnish an apt illustration of what has been said, if the application of the words of the paternal Marquis proved to be entirely Mr Carlyle's, and if the father, instead of saying that his son pierced beneath formulas to reach the essential truths which formulas disguise, meant something as nearly as possible the reverse? Such is the fact. In Mr

Carlyle's separate essay on Mirabeau the words of the Marquis are quoted in their original connection thus :—" And then, his talent for dazzling by superlatives, for he has swallowed all formulas, and cannot substantiate anything." Marquis Mirabeau, a lauded political economist, was familiar with the scientific use of the term "formula," as indicating the result of a train of reasoning, severed from its demonstration, expressed in algebraic characters, and set apart for practical purposes. Such formulas are applied by the practical land-surveyor and the practical navigator, though each may be unable to trace the steps of geometrical reasoning by which his rule has been arrived at. The Carlylian application of the word "formula" to the conventional usages of society was, doubtless, never thought of by Marquis Mirabeau. The concluding words of the sentence last quoted render it obvious to the slightest reflection that he meant to assert that his son, not having honestly worked his way into any science, had yet contrived to pluck the realized fruits of many; and that, parading these, he passed for a man of extensive and profound, while really a man of meagre and showy, knowledge. He wore spectacles, indeed, but not of his own grinding. Instead of saying that the brilliant Count had made away with formulas, the shrewd and exacting Marquis said that he had carefully gathered them up, scrupulously preserved them, and carried them about with him, in order that, on his playing them off to simple eyes, his glitter might be mistaken for gold, and that amazing French vanity, which flickered luridly about the very death-bed of Mirabeau, might be fed with perpetual incense. But need we seek a more pointed illustration of that imaginative fervour which transforms the materials with which it deals than is presented by Mr Carlyle's discovery, in a criticism so severely adverse, of a declaration that the lightnings in Count Mirabeau's eye had burnt up all the forms and falsities of French existence? Mr Carlyle's conception of Mirabeau's character may be in essentials correct ; but the helmet on the statue's head, derived from the repositories of the old Marquis, is as plainly a shaving-pan as that which once graced the head of a weaker but worthier hero.

The second illustration is more interesting, if not more pertinent or convincing, than the first. Will the reader please to step into the studio of Mr Carlyle, in order to inspect the materials of one of his poetic creations, and then to behold them, after the plastic hand has moulded them into a work of Carlylian art ?

Camille Desmoulins thus recounts his proceedings at an important crisis of his history, the date July 12, 1789, the place the Paris Palais-Royal :—

“ It was half-past two ; I came to sound the people. My rage against the despots had passed into despair. I did not perceive that the groupes, though in a state of lively excitement or consternation, were yet at the insurrection point. Three young men seemed to me animated by a more vehement courage. They held each other by the hand. I saw that they had come into the Palais-Royal with the same design as myself ; certain citizens passively followed them. ‘ Messieurs,’ I said, ‘ we have here a commencement of the civic rising ; one of us must devote himself for the cause, and mount a table to address the people.’ ‘ Mount, then.’ ‘ I consent.’ On the instant, I was rather borne to the table than mounted it myself. Hardly was I there, when I saw myself encircled by a vast crowd. Here is my short address, which I shall never forget :— ‘ Citizens ! there is not a moment to lose. I come from Versailles. M. Necker is dismissed. That dismissal is the signal-bell of a St Bartholomew of patriots. This evening the Swiss and German battalions will issue in a body from the Champs de Mars to exterminate us. There is left but one resource ; to rush to arms, and to take cockades that we may know each other.’ The tears were in my eyes ; I spoke with gestures which I could neither recall nor depict. My proposal was received with shouts of infinite applause. I continued : ‘ What colours will you have ? ’ Some one cried out, ‘ Choose you. ’ ‘ Will you have green, the colour of hope ; or blue, the colour of Cincinnatus,—the colour of American liberty and of democracy ? ’ Several voices exclaimed, ‘ Green, the colour of hope ! ’ I cried once more : ‘ Friends ! the signal is given : lo there, the spies and satellites of the police are staring me in the face. I shall not fall into their hands, at least not alive. ’ Then drawing a couple of pistols from my pocket, I said, ‘ Let all citizens do the same ! ’ I descended, stifled with embraces. Some pressed me to their hearts, others bathed me in tears. A citizen of Toulouse, apprehensive for my safety, would on no account abandon me. Meanwhile, they had brought me a green ribbon ; I fixed the first piece of it in my hat, and distributed the rest to those who were around me.”

This description does not lack vividness or spirit ; see, now, how Mr Carlyle’s imagination turns its clear gleam to flame. The following passage is from his History of the French Revolution :—

“ But see Camille Desmoulins, from the Café de Foy, rushing out, sibylline in face ; his hair streaming, in each hand a pistol ! He springs to a table ; the police satellites are eying him ; alive they shall not take him ; not they, alive, him alive ! This time he speaks without stammering :— Friends ! shall we die like hunted hares ? Like sheep hounded into their pinfold ; bleating for mercy, where there is no mercy, but only a whetted knife ? The hour is come ; the supreme hour of Frenchman and Man ; when Oppressors are to try conclusions with Oppressed ; and the word is, swift Death, or deliverance for ever. Let such hour be well-come ! Us, meseems, one cry only befits. To arms ! Let universal Paris, universal France, as with the throat of the whirlwind, sound only : To arms !—‘ To arms !’ yell responsive the innumerable voices ; like one great voice, as of a demon yelling from the air ; for all faces wax fire-eyed, all hearts burn up into madness. In such, or fitter words, does Camille evoke the Elemental Powers in this great moment. Friends, continues Camille, some rallying sign ! Cockades ; green ones ;—the colour of Hope ! As with the flight of locusts, these green tree-leaves ; green ribands from the neighbouring shops ; all green things, are snatched, and made cockades of. Camille descends from his table ; ‘ stifled with embraces, wetted with tears,’ has a bit of green riband handed him ; sticks it in his hat. And now to Curtius’ image shop there ; to the Boulevards ; to the four winds, and rest not till France be on fire !”

There is no question here raised of intentional falsification. Mr Carlyle refers his readers to the work from which I have translated, Vieux Cordelier, par Camille Desmoulins, No. V. The veracity of Shakspeare is not to be impugned by collation of the annals of Venice with the tragedy of Othello, nor that of Milton called in question because the dialogue between Adam and Raphael does not occur in Genesis. But is not the mental operation by which Mr Carlyle produced his picture the same as that by which Shakspeare and Milton realized their scenes and characters ? The imaginative transposition of circumstance, addition of particulars, grouping and colouring of the whole, are Carlyle’s. The rushing out from the Café de Foy, the streaming hair, the pistol in each hand at the commencement of the address,—these we owe to the vision and faculty of the artist. Even the words of Camille must give place to others of an intensity suiting the key at which Mr Carlyle has pitched his conception of the character. The three friends with whom Camille frankly shared his glory are allowed no part of it by the imaginative artist ; the breadth and unity of pictorial effect must not be broken ; the central figure brooks no rival on the canvass. It will be matter of opinion whether Mr Carlyle has improved the work of Camille, or only daubed and spoiled it. The reference to St Bartholomew was much in point in the city whose walls rang with shrieks and musket-volleys on the night of 24th August 1572 ; the audience in the Palais-Royal had heard the trampling of horses, and caught the flash of naked sabres, as those Swiss and German squadrons had gone, in the grey of the morning, to camp in the Champs de Mars. The hares, and sheep, and whetted knives might have seemed too abstractly rhetorical, and Camille, a clear-spirited, witty fellow, though touched, I think, with more of that repulsive appetite for blood which the French Celt exhibits, than Mr Carlyle permits to appear, might have thought that about "supreme hour of Frenchman and Man" somewhat extravagant, if not unintelligible. "Carlyle," remarked a practical man, to whom I once presented the original and the amended descriptions of Camille's performance,— "Carlyle has spoiled it ; he has made a madman of him." There is a slight colour for the suggestion that the account by the actor himself represents a man under high excitement, but still sane, while the figure in the work of high art is actually raving. But what we have to remark is, the strictly poetic manner in which Mr Carlyle has treated the whole incident.

Following the suggestion which these illustrations suffice to convey, any student acquainted with Mr Carlyle's writings may satisfy himself that his mind is of the imaginative, and not of the scientific, order. He judges and teaches by the eye. Is he concerned with history ? He presents his reader with a series of dissolving views of the grand occurrences, leaving causes to be inferred, principles to be deduced, from the mere spectacle. Does he treat social problems, and instruct his countrymen in their political duties ? He conjures up a hero from the twelfth century, teaches us to know and admire him, depicts with consummate skill his manner of life and habits of action ; then, with a wave of his hand, he recalls the present, points the finger of fierce scorn to Mammon-serving dwarfs and game-preserving ogres, and bids us behold our beggarly selves in contrast with the great hero-worshipping generation of Abbot Samson. The political economist, the historian, the social philanthropist, step forward, with qualifying circumstances, with statistical documents, with reasonings irrefragable as the multiplication table. "Professors of the dismal science," exclaims Mr Carlyle, "you may go down !" Is it, finally, of the Christian Religion that he speaks ? Anything like formal demonstration is still more wholly absent than on other occasions. He throws out assertions of "incredibility ;" he presents us once or twice with a poetic figure, which would be expressive if his argumentative position had been established ; but from the high region of dogmatic assertion and imaginative effect he never descends to the old familiar paths of logic and induction.

It is now, so far as I can learn, the unanimous opinion of competent judges,—of those who, while ardently and sympathetically admiring Mr Carlyle's genius, have retained calmness and possessed ability to contemplate its various phases,—that his power is of the imagination. In an article in the Saturday Review, June 19th, 1858, this view is presented with admirable clearness, and supported by convincing evidence. Mr Carlyle is a prose poet.

This determination of the essential character of Mr Carlyle's mind will conduct us to highly important results bearing on his relation to Christianity.

Men have, in all ages, with instinctive decision and unanimity, recognised the imaginative mind as broadly discriminated, in its characteristic qualities and its appropriate tasks, from the mind naturally fitted to estimate evidence and to work in science. When Plato relinquished the ambition of being a poet in favour of that of discovering and teaching truth, he evinced his own belief that the two ambitions were not to be reconciled, and his consciousness that his countrymen did not consult the poets when in quest of exact knowledge. It strikes every one that the man who objected to Paradise Lost on the ground of its proving nothing, applied an absurd test to a poetical production.

It is probable, however, that Plato was too sweeping in his conclusion that poetry and philosophy have no common ground on which to stand. It is still a question whether he does not afford, in his own person, a practical refutation of his theory, —whether he was not, at least, as much a poet as a philosopher. There is a kind of truth which poetry may prove, and become all the nobler poetry for proving. Not to refer to the poet's own department of the Beautiful, which in all its forms admits or requires no further proof than an appeal to human sensibility, it is open to no dispute that, wherever first principles are involved, a direct appeal to the human conscience and reason is the most express and pertinent form which demonstration can assume. We require no logical proof of those maxims of action or duty which spring full-armed from the brain of a Shakspeare, a Bacon, a Goethe. Every fundamental truth in ethics has its patent of nobility written by the hand of God, in characters legible on sight by the soul of man. The strongest reasonings against materialism and atheism are of this underived, intuitively appreciated kind. Such reasonings are admirably in place in poetry, the thrill in the bosom which greets their impassioned utterance being nature's attestation of the true thought or noble sentiment. The dullard who objected to Paradise Lost would have found it rich enough in this kind of demonstration. But the truth which can be reached only by a train of geometrical deduction, or which can have no possible grounds except those first collected in the premises of science, requires a totally different kind of evidence. The most eloquent assertion could not establish the simplest proposition in Euclid, or the simplest principle in botany, or the simplest fact touching an occurrence of the past. So far, therefore, the common sense of mankind has been correct in setting the poets and men of first principles apart from the scientific reasoners.

It is obvious that, so long as men instinctively regarded the poet as possessed of a different kind of capacity and authority from those of the scientific instructor, the mere metrical form in which any doctrine was delivered set them on their guard against its erroneous character or pernicious tendency. The good was easily discriminated from the questionable or the bad. To take an example lying immediately at hand, all persons of taste and discernment can enjoy the grace of sentiment, the delicacy or grandeur of eloquent passion, in the poetry of Byron and Shelley, while no grown man with any pretensions to sense finds difficulty in putting aside what is melodiously absurd in their reasonings and opinions.

But it is characteristic of much of our very recent literature that the metrical form has been abandoned, while almost all else by which poetry is distinguished from prose has been retained. The large assertion, the figurative expression, the emotional arguments, of poetry, have preferred a tacit claim to that force in evidence which is unconsciously accorded to prose. Nor would this be seriously objectionable, if the distinction between first principles and facts ascertainable only by scientific investigation had been uniformly observed. How far this has been the case in general need not be inquired; but there is one writer by whom the kinds of evidence applying to each have been subtly and perilously transposed. That writer is he with whom we are particularly concerned.

It was open to Mr Carlyle to make use of the first-hand appeals of the poet and preacher. The gleams of vivid language in which he has blazoned the goodly qualities of valour, sincerity, faithfulness, veracity, are the fitting demonstration of sentiments which to look at is to love. It is with perfect truth that Mr Carlyle declares such things to lie beyond the province of logic. But he has applied his first-hand reasoning in cases where it cannot possibly avail. He has applied it, first, in social science. What is the result? There is but one opinion among practical men touching his works in that department; that their value is almost inappreciably small. The moment the laugh against the professors of the dismal science subsides, the moment their words are listened to, they are felt to put quietly and conclusively aside all upon which Mr Carlyle has so vehemently insisted. The truths of human history turn out to be, in sooth, a more dismal thing than the glowing pictures of the artist. Weighed in the balances of scientific evidence, the fact that a certain monk in the twelfth century conducted a certain Abbey successfully for some dozen of years, and that his brother monks had contrived to elect him to govern them, yields no single inference applicable to the social or political present. In any century that could be named, men who ordered their households, great or small, with the firmness, integrity, and skill of Abbot Samson, did beyond question exist; hundreds, if not thousands, of Boultons and Budgetts could be named in proof that this century is peculiarly rich in such; while the election of Samson by his brother monks has not a whit closer analogy to the election of senators for the British Parliament than the election of a Fellow in Oxford. The work of Mr Carlyle is discovered to be a political romance, and, even as a political romance, to be argumentatively weak. Mr Carlyle, in the second place, has applied the argumentative method of positive assertion and direct appeal to the facts of the Christian religion.

And precisely the same cause which has deprived his writings on social questions of value, deprives of all authority his rejection of the historical evidence of Christianity. An assertion that the facts of Christianity are "incredible," cannot possibly carry with it any force. Only by the formal demonstration of a scientific treatise could such a proposition be established. Mr Carlyle has not attempted so to establish it. There has never existed a human intellect for which it would not have been towering assumption to expect a statement of the kind to be received without proof. Newton might far better have asked mankind to receive his theory of the solar system on the strength of an ipse dixi, than Mr Carlyle can ask us to obliterate all the stars in the Christian heaven at a mere word from his lip. To be influenced, therefore, by his incidental denials of the truth of Christianity, would seem to be the part only of a dull, slovenly, and servile intellect.

There are one or two considerations, however, which claim our attention, before we can fully understand the import of these declarations of Mr Carlyle. They are connected with his general system of thought. How does the circumstance affect their argumentative value ?

This question will be answered, and the melancholy mystery of Carlyle's rejection of Christianity will become more explicable, as we proceed to notice a remarkable element in his mental constitution not yet touched upon. I allude to a certain affinity for mysticism ; a tendency to vagueness, to abstraction ; a haunting admiration for remote, dimly-looming, indefinite grandeurs. This habit of mind appears to have been of late, in large measure, thrown off by Mr Carlyle ; but at a critical stage in his mental history it had a potent and pernicious influence. His mind affords, in this particular, a marked contrast to that of Sir William Hamilton. From his youth up, Mr Carlyle has required better bread than is baked with wheat. He has not had the rare gift of perceiving how far the simply true is greater than the singularly and magnificently false. He could not stay at home. This was revealed in his critical preferences, as well as in more important instances. Scornfully rejecting the claims of the greatest literary inventor since Shakspeare, Sir Walter Scott, he exhausted panegyric on the works of Goethe; and even among these, his warmest admiration was reserved for the products of that later period when self-consciousness unparalleled, and the bewildering accumulations of laborious culture, had done much to relax the superb artistic energy of Goethe's prime, and to transmute it into the didacticism of an enigmatic sage. Turning with a careless sneer from the Sophoclean splendour of that poetic genius which produced Hyperion, Mr Carlyle gave the name of poetry to those dramas of Lessing whose cold metallic glance was never mistaken by so true a critic as their author for the light that never was on sea or shore. Hastily misconceiving the philosophy of Scotland, and not reflecting how large a mass of cloud may be reduced, say by one piercing beam of electric fire, to a very small quantity of water, he sought refuge in those transcendental speculations of Germany which he has himself lived to call a "hazy infinitude." Was it, considering these circumstances, so surprising that, at the time for calmly and judicially weighing the facts of Christian evidence, he should have been thinking of something "infinitely deeper" than miracles? Was it so improbable that, instead of estimating those considerations, personal and historical, which prove a well-defined and authoritative "type" of life and morals,—a Divine Revelation,—to be a necessity of moral civilization, he should have preferred the unsteady and agitating guidance of the "light within?" Was it not natural that he should have failed to embrace resolutely a definite standard of belief, and should have joined that eclectic school of religion and philosophy which can never, in the one or the other, occupy higher than a second place? Was it, lastly, wonderful that he should have found, or fancied, truth in some everlasting flux of "spirit" passing through endless cycles of "form?"

The constitution of mind with which that of Mr Carlyle has, to say the least, a more marked affinity than is common in Great Britain, is pre-eminently characteristic of Germany. The capacity of believing in ontological schemes is possessed by the Germans in a measure which distinguishes them from every nation of ancient or modern times. Reversing the conduct of the Jews to Moses, they reverence their sages only or chiefly when they are under the cloud. And since Mr Mansel has let fall the pertinent and suggestive hint, that ontological castle-building has detrimentally affected the critical and exegetical labours of the Germans, I venture to add my humble but emphatic opinion, that it has sicklied o'er with the pale cast of speculation their very capacity to estimate evidence. Hegel evolves from logical premises a shadowy scheme of world-development; into a wing of this air-built edifice Baur fits a still more portentously incredible scheme of the rise and development of Christianity. The master having drawn the universe out of logical premises, the disciple draws Christianity out of Paul's exhortation to the squabbling Corinthians, to take to no hero-worship of apostles, but to remember the divine supremacy of Christ. Thus does monster hypothesis beget monster hypothesis, and dream circle within dream. Shrewd Paley had more notion of a fact than a whole college of these wool-gathering doctors. One would not like to be tried for his life by a judge bent upon fitting the facts of the case into the Hegelian hypothesis.

Now, it is quite certain that the deepest principle pervading the works of Mr Carlyle,—that principle which waits, like a reserve force in the background, to lend aid when any of his particular positions is threatened,—is of that hypothetic and ontological kind in which the Germans can believe, and the British cannot. Perhaps it is a shade too strong to say that the British positively could not, after any amount of demonstration, believe in Mr Carlyle's fundamental doctrine ; but it cannot be too strong to say, that it is of a kind which no inhabitant of this island permits to prejudice his mind for or against particular matters of fact. The principle in question is twofold : that man is the highest manifestation and actual presence of God ; and that, by some necessity, for which Mr Carlyle has nowhere accounted, a law of perpetual mutation is impressed upon all those religious beliefs, political organizations, philosophical systems, whereby the man-god maketh himself known. This is the most exact philosophical definition of his belief, and it is at the same time that which most readily assists to a deep practical intelligence of his writings. It is exhibited as held by Mr Carlyle, and the attempt is made to controvert it by arguments cutting to its philosophical roots, in another part of this volume. It would be well if the reader could take that refutation along with him. We are at present, however, concerned only with the practical results of Mr Carlyle's doctrine in their bearing upon his authority against the evidence of Christianity. And the point to be noted is this : that, even should it be pleaded that Mr Carlyle's isolated assertions of the incredibility of the Christian Revelation are supported by his whole scheme of first principles, and are therefore to be viewed rather as enunciations of principle than as statements of particular fact, the sole additional support derived to them is in the twofold doctrine mentioned. For instance, in one of the most important passages in his writings, Mr Carlyle declares that Christianity has now lost hold of human belief, and asks, with the impetuous urgency of one who appeals to a first principle, whether it must not therefore be put out of the way. You may naturally enough allege that the assertion of its having ceased to be believed by men is not only unproved, but palpably erroneous, nay, absurd. This, however, is a ground which you will find it necessary to occupy, only if you concede Mr Carlyle his first principle. Should you refuse to do so,—should you maintain that man neither gave truth to Christianity, nor can take it away,—should you inform him that if you were in a minority of one against the species in believing Christianity, your assurance of its verity would be no whit affected,—then neither his facts nor his principles can find any point at which to effect lodgment in your mind. The self-evident principle on the strength of which he would have you sweep aside, a priori, the whole historical evidence of Christianity, you discover to be a pantheistic theory which hardly any conceivable reasoning could induce you to believe. We conclude, therefore, that the esoteric mysteries by which Mr Carlyle's affirmations that Christianity is incredible are backed up fail to impart to them any scientific evidence, and will prejudice no sensible or independent mind against the facts of the case.

The transition to the most obviously practical characteristic of Mr Carlyle's writings will now be easy. It cannot fail to be seen how he should have come to attribute an ethical significance to reverence for great men. Hero-worship is the religion of pantheism. No man has carried it out with more consistency than Mr Carlyle ; no man has more diligently or devoutly reared altars to the great men in whom the universal divinity, diffused in wan effulgence throughout the universe, has been made for him visible and present. Only by perceiving how deeply this hero-worship is embedded in the system of Mr Carlyle's opinions, only by ascertaining its vital connection with his most intimate convictions, can the language he has used in reference to it appear rational or intelligible. The terms of solemnity and emphasis which he has employed to enforce hero-worship befit only the proclamation of a religion. But it is, of course, not to be alleged that Mr

Carlyle has proposed the literal adoration of great men. Such an idea is out of the question. The influence of his hero-worship has been less express, though exceedingly powerful. In certain particulars, it has not been unmixedly evil. It has led him to study men more earnestly, and to know them more correctly, than any former biographer ; it has led him to rescue from undue depreciation the element of individual human force in history ; it has led him to extol and inculcate human qualities which, however named, ought to be esteemed and emulated. On the other hand, it has produced certain effects of a very different character. It has prevented his pausing at the proper point in the exaltation of the individual, and made him overlook the capabilities of mankind as a race ; it has blinded him to the worth of homely and household virtues, and to the majesty of the common man ; worst of all, it has caused him to compromise or imperil the objective reality and unity of truth by confounding it with the phases of human opinion.

The evil in the works of Mr Carlyle being thus separable, is it not to be desired that the good they contain should be acknowledged and accepted by the Christian world ? It is not well when religion has relaxed its grasp of the leading intellectual phenomena of the day. It least of all becomes the professors of that religion which is not more purely divine than profoundly and comprehensively human,—which defames no natural good, but exalts and transfigures each in the light which makes all things new,—which clothes with the robe of celestial righteousness no passionless anchorite, no insipid earth-angel, no mouther of thin esoteric sentimentalisms, but the entire man, robust in feeling and faculty, in heart and intellect,—to stand aside in blank intolerance or ignorant alarm when some original and potent influence in philosophy or morals is being exerted. The most effectual, and surely the most rational and dignified, manner in which to counteract error, is to assimilate that truth with which, as with an element of binding iron, it has contrived to stubborn its ropes of sand. The gravitation in the world of mind towards daring and powerful intellects would appear to resemble that law in matter by which the lesser body is attracted towards the greater. It was not to the depth or accuracy of their reasonings that Voltaire and Rousseau owed the triumph of their infidelity in the last century, but to the general fascination of their brilliancy and originality. Still, it would be to despair of humanity to believe that truth, if displayed in its ever-fresh vitality and symmetrical greatness, will not exert a more powerful influence than falsehood. Voltaire and Rousseau, in addition to their other advantages, had certain weapons of a really nobler and more Christian character than any which could be handled by the votaries of decrepit and paralyzed Romanism. But there are no weapons from the armoury of truth which cannot be matched and over-matched from the armoury of Christianity ; and by showing that it is in this last armoury that they are of soundest temper, and that from this alone can be drawn a complete equipment for the soul of man, the trust of mankind in our religion may, under God, be confirmed.

Mr Carlyle has offered certain contributions to intellectual civilization of which wise men ought to avail themselves. Well understood, this doctrine of respect for great men, upon which he has been for twenty years expatiating, is of high importance. Upon a just and loyal appreciation of eminently gifted men does the prosperity of mankind,—the beneficent and harmonious working of all social and political institutions,—in an age of potent and advancing democracy, depend. If Mr Carlyle's teaching on this head has not been articulate or exact, let him yet have the credit of bringing into prominence a life-or-death necessity of the time. In the proclamation, besides, of his central doctrine,—in the biographic delineations to which it has led him,—he has accomplished much, and opened the way for the accomplishment of more. Winged with glowing human sympathy, aided by keen insight, his imagination has gone like a torch into the deepening twilight of the past, and thrown a strangely genial and re-animating light upon the faces of the dead. Hume and Gibbon were men of distinguished faculty, superior, probably, in certain qualities of the historian, to Mr Carlyle. But we cannot realize the characters with whom they bring us into a verbal acquaintance as living men. Our sense of kinship with them is dim and faint. Hume had strong sagacity, clear conception of much in national existence, and a broad and firm descriptive method. There is a great deal to be learned from his History. But he had a fatal faith in scoundrelism. With remorseless hand he shreds off the highest and brightest flowers in the gardens of time. He turns all the rainbows of history into dingy grey. Those high figures, again, which strut along the page of Gibbon, quenching their familiar smile in an austere regard of historic dignity, are they in any vital sense known to us? The actions with which their names are associated seem to have no more than a mechanical connection with their individual characters. Mr Carlyle, in the mere worship of that pantheistic divinity which he has seen shimmering and gleaming through all the generations of men, has found celestial fire where Hume saw only the phosphorescence of quackery and falsehood. The same influence which prevented his accepting any belief as simply and eternally true, has prevented his denouncing any belief as wholly and at all times false. The avatars of the pantheistic god have been in heroes, not in quacks. Mr Carlyle has gone in quest of his heroes to the forests of the Norsemen, to the deserts of Arabia, strong in the consoling faith that no really great and lasting thing has been done by the mere impostor and villain. With the sympathy of a great heart, he has found for himself brothers among the mighty of all ages. And in a manner totally different from that of Hume or Gibbon, he writes history for, as he declares it to have been made by, his heroes. Every action is rendered exponent of the personal character and life. The inner world of thought, of feeling, of conscience, is opened to us, and the streams of speech and conduct issue from living fountains. Mr Carlyle's Abbot Samson and Cromwell are known to his readers at least as well as their contemporaries; and the monk of the twelfth century, and the Puritan of the seventeenth, become alike realizable, and admit alike of toleration, respect, love. Abbot Samson is as distinct a delineation as Scott's Marmion, and far closer to historic fact, though Sir Walter's portrait, allowing for a few anachronisms, may be truer than is generally allowed. The smile of humour,—genial, sympathetic, appreciative, but still a smile,—with which Mr Carlyle contemplates the Abbot and his ways, hits with marvellous exactness the style for such a subject. The French master of phrases, bent on doing justice to his ancestors, gilds into an absurd mimicry of the present their whole mode of life; the philosophizing historian indulges in a thin contempt, or a still more inane compassion; Mr Carlyle permits the smile at childlike simplicity, but makes us know well that it was the simplicity of strong and venerable men. By calling attention to the moving human forces of history, by insisting that the entire social organization be shown as the expression and vesture of human character and life, Mr Carlyle has pointed to elements of unsurmised freshness, grandeur, and instructiveness, which will probably impart a new character to the whole future literature of the science. Considered strictly as a poet, Mr Carlyle has, in the last place, claims upon our attention. It has long been my opinion—to be taken here for what it may be worth, since I cannot exhibit all its grounds—that Mr Carlyle was naturally fitted to achieve supreme success in metrical composition, and that he has therefore, to an important extent, mistaken his vocation. If you can write in prose, says Mr Carlyle, do not write in verse. The maxim is a half-truth, or perhaps only a very small fraction or splinter of a truth. Poetry ought to be genuine; bad poetry, being corruption of the best, is intensely detestable; and rhyming facility now so abounds, that these facts ought to be well remembered: all this is matter of course. At the same time, when poetry is genuine, it is above price; and it is a universal law that the natural gift must be nursed and cultivated in order to supreme excellence. The pearl is sought in the depths of the sea; the gold is crushed out of the quartz rock; the fine poetic vein may lie deep, and yet yield to proper care the purest metal. The gift of melodious expression Mr Carlyle rightly considers the distinguishing characteristic of the poet. If it is present in any case, it must define the form of mental exertion then and there appropriate, and its neglect will lead to inappropriate and unsafe activity. The rhythmic cadence in many passages of Mr Carlyle's works, and still more the original melody and pure gleams of colour in his few early poems, suffice to prove that he possessed this natural gift. Had he duly cultivated it, he would have been the greatest poet since Milton. With a faculty of expression on a level with that of Shelley or Tennyson, a more vigorous intellectual structure than the former, and a broader and more active sympathy with life than the latter, he would have done things in the poetry of real life, in the epic or dramatic province, of a kind which has not been exemplified since the historical dramas of Shakspeare. The false philosophy, and the false theology, which have spread contagion throughout his prose, would thus have been deprived of half their perilous influence. As it is, it will not be thought extravagant to define his History of the French Revolution as the greatest imaginative work of a narrative kind produced in the present century. So Homer would have written, had Homer written in prose. Carlyle's language is uniformly that of the poetic inventor ; not gleaned from classic authors or standard dictionaries, but elaborated as the great painter mixes colours to bring out his peculiar tints ; and no writers, except Homer and Shakspeare, have been able to put so much into a single stroke as Carlyle. And if, in the recollection that Mr Carlyle is simply a poetic artist who has written in prose, we decline to attach a scientific value to his hinted estimate of the historical evidence of Christianity, we can safely respond to every pure and exalted sentiment struck out in the sweep of his poetic inspiration. Never sceptic saw so far into the meaning of Christianity as Mr Carlyle ; never sceptic set so generously the Christian hero at the top of greatness ; never, in whispered insinuation or sidelong sneer, has he done the faintest irreverence to that Divine One whom Christians worship. From such a man we need not turn away when he earnestly enforces truths of natural religion, of which Christians require at times to be reminded, as well as those that are without.

But Mr Carlyle has furnished no exception to the law that truth loses in alliance with error. If for no other reason, it is well to form a distinct conception of the good that is in his writings, in order that it may be clearly felt how great has been the injury inflicted upon this mighty genius by rejection of Christianity. When I reflect what Mr Carlyle might have been if he had been a Christian ; how the harmonious completeness of Scriptural morals would have replaced the narrow intensity of his enforcement of one or two moral doctrines ; how trust in One, sitting over the floods, King for ever, would have calmed and heartened him ; how all the brilliancies of his eloquence, all the fervours of his imagination, would have been bound by Christian love, as with an azure girdle, into deeper and stiller beauty ; how the hectic flush, the distempered burning, would have been taken from all he has done ; how he would have learned to understand quiet times, to remember that mere strength, though of the Muses born, is but a fallen angel, and to recognise religion in the peaceful household as well as when " painted upon banners ;" it seems to me as if I could find no such striking proof that the Bible is the one adequate temple for the soul of man, and that only at the feet of Christ can the greatest find rest.

It remains that I indicate one or two of the more important particulars in which " hero-worship" has been more than a name, in which it has been a deteriorating and perverting influence, in the intellectual activity of Mr Carlyle.

Unduly exalting the force and value of individual men, he has overlooked, to an extent sufficient of itself to invalidate his claims as a philosophic thinker, the associative capacities of the race. Hume speaks of " that state which distinguishes a civilized monarchy, and which enables the Government, by the force of its laws and institutions alone, without any extraordinary capacity in the sovereign, to maintain itself in order and tranquillity." Had Hume lived to witness the French Revolution, it might have suggested to his mind one or two rather grave reflections upon this remark ; and we shall agree that, be the sovereignty placed in king or Parliament, the State cannot possibly be safe and prosperous unless the ruling power be gifted with high capacity. But so far as Hume expressed the ancient and unconquerable aspiration after sovereignty of law, as contrasted with slavish subjection to a man or men, he was surely aiming at a great truth ; and most inhabitants of this island will be inclined to hold that the state he describes has been illustriously realized in the monarchy of Great Britain. Mr Carlyle's most characteristic writings constitute a sustained and emphatic denial of any such possibility as that which Hume supposes, and of which Tennyson has sung. Parliaments, politics, constitutions, all yield to his hero-despot. In order to make good his position, he would require to prove that the most philosophic half of language must be discarded ; and he does not shrink from the other necessity which it imposes upon him, of regarding as mere mistake and bewilderment the grand tendencies and aims of modern civilization.

Through the same intense and exclusive appreciation of men of pre-eminent or peculiar capacity, Mr Carlyle has in another way wronged the mass of men, and, in wronging them, has entailed severe retributive injury on himself. He has failed to estimate rightly the value of common human testimony. The evidence of gravitation is not so strong as the word of one honest man. He is poor indeed who cannot number among his friends several whom he would believe if they told him that they had seen the blind receive their sight, the deaf hear, the dumb speak. The disciples of Christ were men whose testimony was adequate to settle that point for ever. And what of their Master ? Strange that Mr Carlyle should not perceive it to be the most incredible of all incredibilities, that even such a man, as he discerns Jesus of Nazareth to have been, could have said falsely that he raised the dead ! And if, apart from all question of inspiration, it is not a historical fact that Jesus Christ laid claim to miraculous power, we need not attempt to ascertain any fact of antiquity whatever.

It is, in truth, deeply remarkable how Mr Carlyle's exaggerated estimate of the heroic in man has prevented him from doing substantial justice even to those whom he has most eloquently eulogized. While according them a worship as heroes with which they would have dispensed, he has denied them that respect as men which they would modestly have claimed. His Luther, his Cromwell, his Knox, believed what to him are incredible delusions. The words of truth, which they trusted to have been written in the characters of eternity, have been bleached out for him by the rains and suns of two or three hundred summers. It is not that they were unacquainted with certain facts which have been laid open by modern research, that they failed to anticipate the march of science, or to forecast the discoveries of a criticism which we may suppose, for argument's sake, to be sound. The doctrine of the atonement, as understood by Luther and Cromwell, is accepted at this day by millions in England, Scotland, and America. Sin is a reality or a delusion to Mr Carlyle, exactly in the sense in which it was a reality or delusion to Knox and Bunyan. A pardon given by God to an agitated conscience, which nothing finite could appease,—a holiness of which the distempered soul could not, except in Christ, have firm assurance,—and the unspeakable peace which visited even the tried hearts of Luther and Cromwell with dawn-streaks of the light of heaven,—these are exactly the same now as then.

Looked fairly in the face, and in its best form, admiration for men is a thing to be cautiously commended and guardedly applied. The instruction and guidance which it is just and noble to accept, lie near to the instruction and guidance which are made the disguise of slavish imbecility or ignoble indolence. The Bozzy is essentially a small and mean creature, excuse him as you may. Men have in all ages been ready enough to cower under Roman Catholicisms, Renaissances, Napoleonisms, and other forms of hero-worship or scoundrel-worship. To separate principles from men, to prize the former without permitting their exaggeration or perversion through association with human passion and fallibility, is among the most momentous problems for men and nations, and one which, in religion, in politics, in art, they have been by no means successful in solving. Only by recognising the unchanging grandeur of moral law, and by acknowledging a common and sole subjection to one Infinite God, can men safely and honourably enjoy the aid of their fellows. "Turn thou from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of?"

The present seems, after all, to be a strange time for bidding men trust to the light within, or to seek for its clear shining in men of genius. Napoleon was a man of genius; yet much a villain. Goethe was a man of genius; and he wrote the Roman Elegies, the most deliberately and malignantly immoral compositions known to me. Edgar Poe was a man of genius,—the greatest poetical genius, probably, that America has produced; and what a melancholy despicability of sin and misery was his history! Heinrich Heine was a man of genius; perhaps the very greatest lyrist of a language whose genius is intensely lyrical; a soul instinct with melody, whose every smile and tear was music; and Heine has left behind him samples of blasphemous profanity which are a disgrace to the species. These are not exceptional names in the annals of recent genius. The association of brilliant genius with some intellectual extravagance or some desolating vice has rather been the rule of these days. It is well to know how men justify their actions to themselves; it is well to widen our horizon of sympathy and tolerance. But has Mr Carlyle exercised sufficient caution in bringing sympathy and pity into proximity with crime? Is it not well to see virtue in its objective reality, and vice in its unveiled deformity? Is it safe to be weighing inducements to cruelty and calculating palliations of debauchery, to yield to admiring impulses in presence of a blood-stained Danton (rather a darker portrait of whom might be truer than Mr Carlyle's), or to find a heroic annihilator of shams in a thorough-going blackguard-like Mirabeau? "If the light in you is darkness, how great is that darkness!"

INTRODUCTORY.

IN perusing The Tale of Goethe, which Mr Carlyle not unwarrantably supposes to be an allegorical presentation of certain conceptions of its author touching the characteristics and tendencies of our time, attention can scarce fail to be arrested by the destiny there appointed for the Christian Religion. In the Temple of the Future, the hut of the fisherman, to which former and darker generations had looked for aid in every grand emergency of existence, still found a place. The light of reason, entering in, breathed through it a new life and an immortal beauty. "By virtue of the Lamp locked up in it, the hut had been converted, from the inside to the outside, into solid silver. Ere long, too, its form changed; for the noble metal shook aside the accidental shape of planks, posts, and beams, and stretched itself out into a noble case of beaten ornamented workmanship. Thus a fair little temple stood erected in the middle of the large one, or, if you will, an Altar worthy of the Temple." The whole passage of which this forms a part is perhaps the finest illustration to be found of a certain wide-spread and multiform intellectual phenomenon of the day. An attitude is assumed towards Christianity which may for a moment be regarded as one of deference and admiration, but which a more careful consideration shows to be determined radically by contempt. The serene worshipper of reason or of man will concede the Christian Religion that polite and patronizing tolerance with which a generous victor treats the distinguished prisoner whose sword he has hung on the wall of his tent. The significance of Christianity as a fact in history, the superiority of its moral code, the depth of its ethical philosophy, will be eloquently exhibited, if only it is tacitly allowed that strict belief in its doctrines is no longer consistent with high intellectual culture, and actual submission to its authority no longer compatible with healthful and vigorous intellectual life. Christianity, we are told, is the highest thing man has done ; it is the most excellent in the general family of religions ; it has voiced the deepest emotions of the human breast. Language displaying all the sweetness, force, and gorgeousness of poetry has been woven into wreaths to crown it ; intellect, wide in its comprehensiveness, and imposing in its power, has offered it a vassal throne. And how are Christians bound to receive the haughty condescension of this praise ? A legend from the times of the spread of Christianity furnishes an example for their guidance. Offers, it is declared, were made to the professors of the Religion of Jesus of a kind which seemed flattering and favourable. They might have obtained for their Master a niche in the Pantheon of the ancient world ; they might have sheltered their faith under the wide wings, dropping gold and manna, of the Roman eagles. A refusal on their part to accept the proffered distinction might well appear to those by whom the proposal was made an instance of intolerable and infatuated pride. That The Crucified of Judea should be deemed mightier than the Jupiter of the Capitol,—that the words of a few poor fishermen should be esteemed more worthy than the ancient voice of the Sybil, and the mystic whisperings of a thousand sacred groves,—this was an idea to astonish and incense the Pagan world. But the declaration of the smitten Galileans was explicit and unchanging :

The Gospel of Jesus is everything or it is nothing ; if true at all, every god and oracle must vanish before it. To the insidious homage paid in many a cultivated circle to Christianity at present, our answer can be none other than that which was given of old. Christianity lives a Divine life, or dies. Until the concession is made that it is Divine, in no qualified sense, but to the express intent that it came down from heaven, no approximation is made to what it demands.

It cannot, however, be unattended with important results to prove that, viewed whether from the side of theory or of life, this contemptuous assumption of the obsolescence of Christianity is gratuitous and indefensible. On the side of theory, there has no moral or spiritual truth emerged in the world of culture, which it does not either embrace in its own scheme, or transcend by a truth that is nobler and deeper. In actual existence, it is still the basis of moral and practical life to men of unquestioned integrity, and of robust, advanced, and liberal intellect ; and it is the animating principle in social combinations of a vigorous and natural kind. In the nineteenth century, we have nothing in the way of spiritual and religious truth to add to what was given us by the peasants who followed Christ among the hills of Judea ; and it must be in distinct contemplation of the fact, that eighteen centuries of civilization have failed to eclipse the light which they professed to have received from heaven, that we pronounce this declaration of theirs a lie. Proof of these propositions it is my object in the following pages to present.

It is proposed, first, briefly to review, in connection both with the individual and the social life, as embraced in the Christian scheme, two of the most conspicuous phases of recent intellectual activity, antagonistic to Christianity ; and, next, to exhibit the living power of Christianity, in the individual and the society, by means of a series of illustrative biographies.

PART I.

THEORETIC STATEMENT.

THE INDIVIDUAL LIFE.

It is partly because of the elaboration and extent of its defences, but much more because it is conspicuously a manifestation of present intellectual activity, that the philosophical system of M. Comte has been selected to represent here the atheistic theory of man, his duties and his destinies. The rapid advance of physical science within the last hundred years has rendered it possible to rear a structure of ascertained fact and law in science more comprehensive and imposing than any which could have been previously formed. By many minds the largeness of system will ever be mistaken for the stability of truth. With a logic perhaps somewhat more thoroughgoing and consistent, and a scientific domain for its application considerably extended, the philosophy of M. Comte shares the essential characteristics and the incurable feebleness of all materialist systems. But it is open to no dispute that the positive philosophy is a prominent growth of recent speculation, or that its disciples assume airs of enlightened contempt in reference to Christianity.

The axiom which must lie at the basis of all systems of materialism is found at the basis of that of M. Comte. This axiom is, that sense is the sole source of evidence and the sole ground of belief. It immediately follows that the only sphere of real existence is that of physical phenomena. Man can do no more than classify the facts and sequences which sense observes ; the immaterial world becomes a mere fiction of thought ; and an immortal life, and a living God, are alike shown to have been products of the "young imagination" of the race.

It is in its profound and comprehensive atheism that the Positive Philosophy has any distinctive character. It sets out with an express negation of all that is unseen. The very question of theism is excluded as one of the "problems of our infancy." The positive method pushes it quietly, and as a matter of course, from its path. The ancient Jewish high priest wore on his forehead, as a sign before which armies and emperors should bow down, the mystic name of Jehovah ; this philosophy bears as its badge the express and conclusive legend, There is no God.

No important qualification of this statement is rendered necessary by the fact, that the dotage of Comte bore fruit in what he called a religion and an Etre Supreme. It is something that even the hard and arid nature of Comte became conscious of an inhuman and intolerable vacuity in the region of mere phenomenal logic. It is something to see even Comte driven to piteous extremities in filling up his conception of humanity, by the theory which makes man merely a creature of sense. It is pleasing to know that Comte had a heart, and could feel the tender majesty of home. But that he ever passed beyond the limits of atheism, cannot be for a moment maintained. When he felt the fountains of his nature drying up,—when the dim sense awoke within him of the necessity of a celestial economy as counterpart to the system of earthly relations,—he did not reverently own the sacredness and authority of the instinct, and bend the knee to that God of whom it whispered. He never wavered in his pride. He turned once more to his logic. He marked off a certain number of his conceptions, and named them a subjective Etre Supreme. He acknowledged the want of a God ; but, instead of turning to the Living One, he set up a graven image, which he avowed not to be objective, that is, not to be alive. His construction of a "religion" was the consummation of his atheism.

Mr Lewes, in putting in a plea in arrest of the verdict of atheism against Comte, appears to be unaware of the extent of the legitimate defences of that theory. The effect of atheistic belief will, beyond question, be to shrivel up all the finer affections of the heart, and to relax every bond of morality. But it is not necessary for the logic of atheism to do this. Not only could there be an atheistic religion of the affections, on the model of Comte's, but an atheistic religion of conscience, in which our ethical judgments were treated as purely and ultimately autonomic. But were these two combined and elaborated, so as to result in a scheme of atheism incomparably grander than that of Comte, there would still be an infinite chasm between it and any scheme of theism. "Besides the religion of humanity," says Mr Lewes, "there must be a Religion of the Universe ; besides the conception of humanity, we need the conception of a God as the Infinite Life, from whom the Universe proceeds, not in alien indifference—not in estranged subjection—but in the fulness of abounding Power, as the incarnation of resistless Activity." This is, indeed, irreconcilable with atheism ; but it is strange that Mr Lewes, thus proved to be a theist, should have been betrayed even by a commendable kindness of heart into a mistake as to the real character of the views of Comte.

The strength of positivism, so far as even apparent strength can be asserted of it, does not lie in the fantastic vagaries of that "religion" of which Comte, in his latter days, declared himself the high priest, but in the emphasis of his early assertion that there is no province either for faith or for speculation except the physical. There is a clearness and simplicity in the methods and results of physical science which cannot fail to convey a certain satisfaction to the mind. The achievements of inductive research since the days of Bacon have surpassed the forecastings of intellect and the dreams of imagination. The prospect to which the positivist can point of advancement in the same direction, when every human energy is devoted to earth, and concentrated in time, may be rendered august and magnificent. Let us suppose that man, distracted by no whisper of immortal destinies, has for centuries been occupied in tilling and surveying the world in which he dwells. A lordly spectacle presents itself to the eye of imagination. Agricultural science has done its work. The most rugged soil has yielded to the skill of man. Where once spread the barren and unwholesome marsh, the golden corn is waving, or the rich meadow, the bee humming among its flowers, the sheep and cattle straying upon its knolls, smiles in the noonday sun. To the top of the mountain the plough has been carried, and the eternal snows and storms have seen their domain curtailed by the power of chemistry and mechanics. Commerce, aided by the powers of observation and the genius of invention, has been urged to supreme development. The tempest of the deep has been bridled and subdued by man ; science has watched the monster in the homeless tracts where he sought his prey, and learned to trace his footstep, to know his approach, to baulk his might. A universal free trade and perfected locomotion distribute the productions of all climates. The Positive Philosophy has not remitted its more strictly intellectual labours. Every phenomenon has been referred to its class ; every sequence has been noted ; and the regularities of matter have been arranged under the name of laws. Statistical science has educated society to the utmost limit of self-consciousness, perfecting the theory, and regulating the action, of civilization. The museum of the world has been furnished, the storehouse of the world has been filled ; the movements of the stars have been set forth in geometric diagrams ; the Positive Philosophy is complete.

Extend and embellish this perspective of the future as far as you may, in consistence with M. Comte's principle, and it must still be alleged that the theory of positive atheism dis-crowns man and takes the light off the universe. What is all this wealth, what all this power, which it offers ? They are at best but the bribe which earth tenders to the human being, to induce him to deny his celestial origin and to barter his spiritual inheritance. What is all that fabric of Positive Science, rising in its still, cold magnificence, covering earth and shutting out heaven ? It is a magnificent tomb for the spirit of man. Adorn it as you will, let the flags of all the sciences float over it, it is but an ornamented grave. And if you tell me that living and reasoning creatures move about within it, I will refuse to give the name of men to those who declare themselves "cunning casts in clay." It would be a false delicacy which scrupled to affix to that order of human intellect which can accept the creed of atheistic materialism the brand of irredeemable and everlasting inferiority. It does not penetrate beyond the most superficial film of things ; it does not perceive that the tremulous radiance which shimmers through the veil of finitude has its source in the light-fountains, dark through excess of brightness, of the outer infinite, of the eternal God. Religion, were it but a delusion, would outweigh in value the utmost possible realization of the philosophy of Comte. Where it comes, all waxes dim : its foot blackens the stars. For why should we care to look to those stars, if they are but the mockery of our little day of life ? Why should we delight to search into the beauty of the earth around us, if it yields but a table and a grave, and has instilled into our veins the strange maddening poison of a capacity to dream of a better fate? Physical science itself, which, when it is the humble interpretation of a material nature that manifests the great Immaterial Cause, is to be prized and cultivated, is covered with contumely by alliance with atheism; in the words of Chalybæus, it becomes either the handmaid of a poor curiosity, or a "partner of trade." According to the Positive Philosophy, religion was the first great human delusion, metaphysics the second. The course of humanity has, it proclaims, been that of the North American Indian, who, as he imbibes the ideas and acquires the habits of civilization, lays aside, one by one, the bits of painted glass, the strings of beads, and the gaudy feathers, which were erewhile his glory. Shall we not rather say that, on its hypothesis, the course of humanity is to be that of the monarch who ruled well, and looked proudly, in his youth and manhood, but on whom the dotage of age came, and who laid aside his diadem, unclasped his royal robe, and shut himself up in a grave which he had hewn for himself in a rock?

How deeply melancholy is the life of man if he has no inheritance in the past or the future; if he has no assurance of immortal existence; if there are no mighty nations of the dead; if the friends he has loved are nothing more than clay or dust, and between him and annihilation there is but a breath! How all the dewy umbrage of his sympathies would wither, the fountains of his heart dry up! A man comes upon the world with mighty powers, capable of exerting an influence which will outlive himself by thousands of years. He stands amid his own generation, but his mind's dwelling is all time; on his own little world, but his mind's dwelling is immensity. He acts, or thinks, or sings. If he has planned an Alexandria or a Babylon, he must pass away ere its streets and quays are ranged in the order in which his mind's eye saw them; if he has desolated realms, he may have to depart before nature, weeping over them in rain, and smiling on them in sunshine, has wrapped them again in soothing green. If he has pondered half his lifetime on the condition and destinies of man, and constructed some proud scheme for the advancement of his race, he must be gone ere any save its initial effects are witnessed. If he have sung some lofty song, a Divine Comedy or Paradise Lost, which will take the ear of the ages, and be listened to by many generations, he must himself lie down and die when perhaps only a few bosoms have thrilled to its music. Man here has time only to do his work and dig his grave. If he can believe that the buried generations have gone onward to another state of existence, and if he can himself look forward to a protracted life, in which he will retain his personality, his connection with humanity, his capacity to know and to be known, to love and to be loved, and that interest in all things human which he had while on earth, he may work in the sense of inducements truly sublime. But how he shrivels in the glance of the Positive Philosophy ! Man the animal, even the comparing and generalising animal, were a pitiful and anomalous thing ; man the spirit wanders through eternity, and is formed verily in the image of God.

As the distinct belief in a future existence,—an existence conscious, personal, objective,—is the necessary complement of man's nature, so far as it awakens hopes and discovers possibilities, so the belief in a living God is necessary as the complement of his nature, so far as it aspires after holiness, and forms the conception of duty. There must not be taken from man the belief in an Infinite Being ; in that belief alone can his whole nature be developed and displayed ; thus alone does he find the humility that does not degrade him, and the honour that makes him not proud ; the faith that clothes him in strength, and the reverence that breathes over his face a softened majesty ; the love that makes him a fellow of angels, and the fear that reminds him he is still on the earth ; the blessing that breathes tenderly on his pathway here, and the hope that beckons from the golden walls. There is a beauty in the face of man when his God smiles on it, as on the face of the babe in his cradle on which a father looks in joy, which must not be taken away. There is an earnestness in the heart and life of a man when he knows that the eye of the Eternal is on him, which must not be foregone. There is an eternity of consequence in every act of an immortal, which he cannot deny and continue to work. The finite being staggers in bewilderment when separated from the Infinite ; he cannot stand alone in the universe ; he cannot defame his spirit without darkening it, he cannot scorn faith without weakening reason, he cannot deny God and reach the full strength and expansion of his faculties as a man. Coleridge says truly, that religion makes all glorious on which it looks. How poor the education for my highest faculties, obtained by going round the world to learn in what order its phenomena are ranged, and to discover as my highest reward new food to eat and new raiment wherewithal I may be clothed ! How effectual and sublime is the education I receive in the survey, if every object I meet is gifted with a power of exhaustless suggestion, and every leaf of the forest and star of the sky is a commissioned witness for my God, and no careless trill of woodland melody, no chance gleam of sunlight over the fountain that leaps from the crag, and, reckless as it is, must stay to reflect in its rainbowed loveliness the beauty of heaven, no wild wave tossing joyous on the pathless deep, but has power to call into action my highest and holiest powers, of wonder, of reverence, of adoration !

These considerations are in strict accordance with the superb argument with which Kant concludes his Critique of the Practical Reason. The vista of a future life, touched with the ever-brightening radiance of immortal holiness and joy ; and the existence of a Divine Being, combining infinite power with moral perfection ; these were discerned by the sage of Kœnigsberg to be the grand indispensable postulates of the practical reason, without which the realization of man's highest good is impossible.

In connection, indeed, with this whole question, the dictates of instinct, of reason, and of feeling, lie close together. The testimony of the race against atheism has been so unanimous that, to conclude it erroneous, would be to bring in a verdict of hopeless imbecility, of unaccountable, incurable, aimless madness, against mankind. If there is no world of unseen realities, the last lingering grandeurs of savage life, and the loftiest aspirations of the poet and the sage, become alike unmeaning and ridiculous. Where untutored man acts in the mere strength of nature, we are met by spectacles which, however sad, possess one element of sublimity in that they bear witness to man's belief in immaterial relations, in spiritual existence ; at the other end of the scale of humanity, where the loftiest intellects of the race rest in the solitude of greatness, our experience is the same. Had I visited the banks of some lone Indian river, while the Hindoo superstition still reigned supreme, I should have found that I had not yet reached a grade of society in which an invisible world was denied or forgotten, in which man could name no motive strong enough to silence the remonstrances or to outbid the offers of sense. I might have seen the widow brought out to die upon the funeral pile of her husband. I might have wept over that fair form, in its simple beauty, where the blush and the dimple of girlish hope were just yielding to the matron smile, and deemed it all too lovely for the embrace of fire. But even there I should have had a haughty consolation, and I might have gazed with pride in my melancholy, because that there, too, the human spirit asserted its supremacy over pain and death, and because even there, for duty and devotion, a weak woman could die. On the other hand, there can be no doubt as to the spontaneous and indignant recoil of those minds which the acclamations of the race pronounce the greatest and best, from that universal blasting negative which distinguishes the Positive Philosophy. While men gaze in revering pride towards Plato, and honour the lofty contempt with which Fichte looked down upon the joys of sense, while there is rapture in the eye of Poetry, and majesty on the brow of Philosophy, sight will not prevail against faith, sense will not, with its exhalations, choke the spirit. Your light Anacreons, and careless Horaces, and frivolous Moores, may continue to sing ; your Gibbons and Humes may still work ; your system-builders, with ears deafened by their own hammering, and backs bent with stooping to their own toil, will not cease to build ; but no Homer or Dante, no Shakespere or Milton, no Coleridge, and, I shall even add, no Shelley, will sing under the auspices of the Positive Philosophy ; your Fichte, your Carlyle, your De Quincey, your Tennyson, your Ruskin, will refuse to serve nature on such conditions ; they will throw up their commissions at once. What men have deemed best deserving of the name of thought would expire.

“ Why thought ? To toil, and eat,
Then make our bed in darkness, needs no thought.”

We have been told that immortality inspires the lyric Muse ; that it is the light in the distance which kindles her eye ; but the Positive Philosophy would turn her song into a funeral dirge. Quotation after quotation might be made from poetry, in indefinitely extended succession, of appeal from this theory, and assertion of a higher lot for man. Young exclaims, as if in anger,

“ Were then capacities divine conferr’d,
As a mock diadem, in savage sport,
Rank insult of our pompous poverty,
Which reaps but pain, from seeming claims so fair ?”

Shelley, with all his profession of atheism, shrinks startled from the brink of annihilation :—

“ Shall that alone which knows
Be as a sword burnt up before the sheath
By sightless lightning ? ”

Tennyson expressly alleges he would not stay in a world where the demonstration of the Positive Philosophy was complete : he would not confess himself and his fellows to be “cunning casts in clay :”—

“ Let science prove we are, and then
What matters science unto men,
At least to me ? I would not stay.”

In the following stanza he again defines man on the hypothesis that he is no more than an animal, and has no more to enjoy or look to than the pleasures of sense :—

“ No more ? a monster, then, a dream,
A discord. Dragons of the prime,
That tare each other in their slime,
Were mellow music match'd with him.”

In a poem by Coleridge, which does not appear to be very well known, a general estimate is made of the absurdity and contradiction which are all remaining to man when he has denied his immaterial and immortal existence :—

“ If dead, we cease to be ; if total gloom
Swallow up life's brief flash for aye, we fare
As summer-gusts, of sudden birth and doom,
Whose sound and motion not alone declare,
But are their whole of being ! If the breath
Be life itself, and not its task and tent,
If even a soul like Milton's can know death ;
O Man ! thou vessel purposeless, unmeant,
Yet drone-hive strange of phantom purposes !
Surplus of nature's dread activity,
Which, as she gazed on some nigh-finish'd vase,
Retreating slow, with meditative pause,
She form'd with restless hands unconsciously !
Blank accident ! nothing's anomaly !
If rootless thus, thus substanceless thy state,
Go, weigh thy dreams, and be thy hopes, thy fears,
The counter-weights !—Thy laughter and thy tears
Mean but themselves, each fittest to create

And to repay the other ! Why rejoices
 Thy heart with hollow joy for hollow good ?
 Why cowl thy face beneath the mourner's hood,
 Why waste thy sighs, and thy lamenting voices,
 Image of image, ghost of ghostly elf,
 That such a thing as thou feel'st warm or cold ?
 Yet what and whence thy gain, if thou withhold
 These costless shadows of thy shadowy self ?
 Be sad ! be glad ! be neither ! seek or shun !
 Thou hast no reason why ! Thou can'st have none ;
 Thy being's being is a contradiction."

This reference to the effects of the Positive Philosophy, and this appeal to the testimony of mankind concerning it, are intended to bear a strict argumentative value. They prove it not to correspond to the legitimate and authoritative conception formed by man of his nature and destinies. But it may be useful to subject its fundamental position to at least a partial examination under the strict forms of philosophic method.

The Positive Philosophy includes in one sentence of abolition all metaphysic and all religion. The ontological realities which metaphysic requires as the groundwork of phenomena, and the living God in whom religion finds the ultimate source of all moral law, it alike denies. In the last resort this negative becomes one, and amounts to an absolute and all-comprehending elimination of immaterial agency or influence from the frame of things. A man can therefore bring it immediately beneath the eye of his reason, by a calm and strict interrogation of consciousness, whether he is able, first, to believe that all the effects, to wit, all the phenomena, he sees, are the result of no efficient, power-implying cause, and, second, to believe this cause to be material.

The unchangeable canon of reason, by which man seeks a cause for every effect, is that in obedience to which all philosophy, physical as well as metaphysical, has come into existence. "I am convinced," says Mr J. S. Mill, "that anyone accustomed to abstraction and analysis, who will fairly exert his faculties for the purpose, will, when his imagination has once learnt to entertain the notion, find no difficulty in conceiving that in some one, for instance, of the many firmaments into which sidereal astronomy now divides the universe, events may succeed one another at random, without any fixed law." Even supposing that we could conceive phenomena thus to succeed without fixed law,—even though no order appeared in their succession,—we could not possibly divest ourselves of the conviction that each succeeding event had a cause. To the flickering play of effect, instinct would instantly adjust a corresponding capriciousness, but a constant efficiency, of power. How would the mind of man act in such a world as Mr Mill supposes? It would at once attempt to pierce beyond what was seen. It would exhaust itself in endeavours to assign unity of cause to the changing show. The means it would adopt to reach unity could be none other than classification; and if, as is the supposition, there were no similarities or dissimilarities to render classification possible, it would not, indeed, believe the effects causeless, but would recoil in paralysis from a world in which the initial operations of the understanding were impossible. Abstract, on the other hand, the impelling causal conviction of reason, and a similar result is instantaneously, and in any conceivable world, arrived at. Did it not strike Mr Mill that the world he imagines answers closely to our earth as it lay before the first man who ever philosophized; still more closely to our earth as it is known to the totally uninquiring savage; and with absolute exactness to our earth as it presents itself to Mr Mill's dog? A seeming chaos of phenomena is the material which our world at first offered to the eye of philosophy. A sentient being placed in it, possessing no instinctive conviction that phenomenal effect implied cause, could never have made a step in its arrangement under the unities of law. Identities of effect might for ever have flitted before his eye; but the idea of effect was foreign to him ; the sign stood for nothing ; and ten thousand repetitions of the meaningless symbol could not suggest a step towards unity. When every effect brought with it an assertion of cause, when it was instinctively felt that ten thousand identities of effect must count one in power, the path towards the unity of philosophy was entered upon. That physical philosophy did not originate in, and is not sustained by, sense alone, requires, in fact, no further proof than the case of the lower animals. They possess the sensuous instruments of induction ; but the ordinance of cause they know not ; and it is, in consequence, for ever impossible for them to forge a link in that chain of science which is formed by the human understanding, impelled by the faiths of reason, and employing the instruments of sense. And if the instinct of cause cannot be relinquished, even in conception, without a complete paralysis of human thought, causal power must surely be accepted as one of those facts of real existence which are attested by the ultimate and irrefragable laws of our constitution.

The fact of cause being established, the next inquiry is, whether reason can the more readily accept a material or an immaterial cause. If consciousness is carefully interrogated, it will pronounce nothing more directly and abruptly offensive to reason than the idea of matter originating anything. We cannot dissociate the idea of origination from will, thought, mind. If there is one notion by which we define matter more than another, it is that it is powerless. So importunate, so inextinguishable, is this instinct, that even a Comte will forget himself into saying that causes are "inaccessible;" a concession that they are at least not to be identified with any processes of matter. Why is it that the rudest sailor never imagines for a moment that the magnet, the cause of whose motion no philosopher can explain, moves itself ? And do we not find this irresistible propulsion towards an immaterial cause acting with the law of causality in the production of philosophy ? Was it not because the human mind could not possibly rest in matter as the cause of the changes, the varieties, the very existence, of matter, that it subjected nature to the inquisition of observation and of induction? Ancient philosophy passed from broader to broader generalization of material agency, until it found itself in the presence of one immaterial Being. However it procures the idea of one mental cause,—whether from a Plato or a Mohammed,—the human mind accepts it with natural spontaneity, and rests in it with infinite consolation. In our own time, the subordinate unities of physical agency have been made the subject of far more complete classification than in former ages. But instead of discovering anything in matter to respond to our instinct of cause, physical science has merely extended the proof that no such material entity exists. The fact of efficient cause is still indispensable to the logic of induction; the association of power with mind is as urgent a demand of our reason as of old. Shall we then accept the classified regularities of the Positive Philosophy for our perfect theorem of the universe? If the sage of the early time looked upon the material world, with its mysterious renovations, with its involved and awful forces, with the flushings of its ethereal, ever-changing beauty, and yet refused to find it more than the revealing of an infinite spirit behind,—if the “deep-hearted son of the wilderness” saw in the glancing of the stars above the Arabian deserts only the manifestation of immaterial power, only the writing of the name of Allah,—shall we rest satisfied with the few lines of system that physical inquirers have drawn across the face of the world, and seek no more to approach an Infinite Spirit? Because we can trace somewhat farther than our fathers the ramifications of the great system of phenomena towards the unity of law,—because we can follow one or two of the branches of the world-tree towards the mighty stem of cause,—are we therefore to deny that any cause exists? We now know nature better than before; but this is surely no reason why we should extinguish that faith which makes the knowledge of nature precious, the faith that it sheweth forth the glory of God.

It is not necessary, it would not perhaps be possible, to treat with closeness any problems of the individual life in connection with the Positive Philosophy. We have to pass into a higher region before such, except in their primary and rudest forms, present themselves. But the natural, and, in the long run, the inevitable effect of the positive negation of belief upon individual character has been rendered matter of simple and easy inference ; and if we discover that the problem of the individual character is solved by Christianity, in a way infinitely superior even to that of a far purer and loftier philosophy, the conclusion against the positive school will be a fortiori clear and decisive.

The pantheistic view of man and his destinies, which is now to occupy our attention, contrasts with that of the school we have been contemplating in comparative indistinctness of theory and comparative potency in life. The strength of positivism lies in the icy clearness of its science ; the strength of modern pantheism lies in its vivid and exultant appreciation of living energy, and commanding will, and those mighty emotional forces which heave and agitate the being from a region far deeper than that of the logical understanding. In the works of Fichte, in certain of those of Goethe, and, above all, in some of those of Carlyle, the great spiritual beliefs of humanity are presented with an urgency of assertion, with a proud impatience of controversy, with an assumption of inherent and imperial authority, the mere splendour of whose burning is sufficient to melt the thin frostwork which the positivist argumentation draws along the mind. The essential position of this school is, that man is a manifestation of God. Originally determined by the philosophy of Kant to an intense realization of the elements of man's moral nature, it has substantially obliterated the distinction between the human and the Divine, without consciously or avowedly abandoning the facts of conscience and of freedom. In Fichte's Way to the Blessed Life, the identification of the Divine and the human is scientifically expounded, the Divine essence being represented as taking upon itself by necessity the form of existence, and being individualized in men. It would be inconsistent with the scope of this work, and would entail too large demands upon readers, to quote largely from this book of Fichte's, or to exhibit in detail its train of reasoning. Suffice it to say, that Fichte, with emphatic reiteration, denies substantial existence to any but the absolute being, the absolute ego. It is a mistake to consider the Fichtean egoism atheistic. As a philosophic system, it may be argued that it does not solve the problem of human or phenomenal existence ; it may be argued also, that it offers no real proof either of God or of man,—that, to use the words of Sir William Hamilton, “at the first exorcism of a rigorous interrogation,” it “relapses into nothing ;” but of the two, God and man, it certainly assigns the primary and essential being to the former. The absolute Being is the “one free ego ;” it is divided into an infinite number of “egos or individuals.” All that is high, beautiful, enduring, sublime, in humanity, is the more perfect passing into manifestation, in the necessary individual form, of unchanging and eternal being. It becomes thus evident how, in the hands of one whose moral nature was originally, like that of Fichte, of an exalted and generous order, and who had been prepared for his work of deduction by a training in Kant's school of transcendently refined morals, an elevated and inspiring theory of human duty and destiny could be elaborated. Beneath the new nomenclature, the highest dictates of natural religion, transfigured, it might be, in a light derived from Christianity, would be returned upon us. Fichte assuredly so returned them ;

but philosophy, even when it assumes a garment belonging of right to Christianity, is infinitely inferior to, and must not be confounded with, the religion of the Cross.

It is, however, of secondary importance for us to trace the stream of modern pantheism to its source in the egoism of Fichte and the transcendentalism of Kant. That the practical pantheism which pervades the works of Mr Carlyle could be traced by the biographer or the philosophic historian to the express influence of Fichte, and certain of his great German contemporaries, is to me a matter of clear conviction. But Mr Carlyle has consistently and studiously avoided philosophical nomenclature and scientific form, and in his works the view under examination comes out, rather as what Archdeacon Hare calls a "pantheistic spirit," animating and colouring every sentiment, than as a distinct theory. It is an assertion of the majesty of man even against the Infinite; the hero is the manifestation of God. But for Mr Carlyle, as for Fichte, a way was thus opened up to the recognition of all which his instinct of rectitude and of truth responded to in history and in life. A certain intense, mighty, and, I shall add, august enthusiasm for what is believed to be goodness and truth is the animating principle in the works both of Fichte and of Carlyle. Fichte perceived truth and goodness in their loveliness and serenity; Carlyle has bowed down to them when he thought he saw them incarnated as power.

It is not to be wondered at that for young, hoping, aspiring minds, the visionary grandeurs of such a pantheism as that of which we have now some glimpse, should possess a powerful though bewildering fascination. Its theory of God, man, and the universe, can be represented in a sublime manner. Positivism can say nothing of the world but that it is, for the living a workshop, and for the dead a grave; nothing of the soul of man, but that it is a mode in which a material organism works. But pantheism fills the world with spirit.

—turns all that is seen into the visualized existence of infinite being. When expressed in the chastened and stately beauty of the language of Fichte, or clothed in the poetic gorgeousness of that of Carlyle, it can scarce fail to excite enthusiasm. It may be well to present in a single view, founded strictly upon the work of Fichte, already named, and upon one or two chapters in Mr Carlyle's Sartor Resartus, the conception of God and the universe formed by the pantheist, and to set it in contrast with that of the Christian.

The great All is no machine, say these writers, no piece of dead though elaborate mechanism. The tree Igdrasil of the old Norsemen was better than that ; to look on the universe as godlike and god, how infinitely better is that ! One mighty tide of divine force, filling immensity with the eternal ebb and flow of Being and Appearance, its waves galaxies and systems, its foam sparkling with worlds,—acknowledge that, they say, as at once universe and God. The pantheist is himself one little conscious drop in the boundless tide, in the all-embracing infinite. In the branching of the stars this infinite life rushes forth ; in the flower at your feet it lives. Higher still is the manifestation which it finds in the embodying of human thought—in the rearing of nations and polities, in the building of towered cities, in all noble work and effort. It has struggled dimly into exhibition in the beauties, grandeurs, and terrors of all mythologies,—the grave look of the Olympian king, the still and stainless beauty of the woodland Naiad, the bright glance of the son of Latona, the thunder-brows of Thor, the dawn smile of Balder. The beauty which is the soul of Art,—the majesty that lives from age to age in the statue of Phidias, the smile that gladdens the eyes of many generations on the perfect lip and in the pure eye of a Madonna by Raphael, the serene and perfect ideal which the artist has in his soul, and which he never yet could realize with chisel or with pencil,—is its very self. Highest and purest of all it appears in the life of virtue. “In what the holy man does, lives, and loves, appears God no more in shadows, and wrapped in a garment, but in his own immediate and efficient life.” What, now, do we behold, when we turn, with unsandalled foot, to look upon the universe and the God of Christianity? An immensity, to the bounds of which, urge them never so wildly, the steeds of thought will never pierce, thronged with ordered myriads of worlds, all willed into existence, and ever upheld, by a Being of whom tongue cannot speak or mind conceive, but who lit the torch of reason, who hears the voice of man, and whose attributes are dimly mirrored in the human soul. Endeavour to embrace the universe in thy conception; let thought take to it the wings of imagination, and imagination open the eye of contemplation; view this stupendous illimitable whole. Then conceive God infinitely above it; filling it with his light as the sun fills with its light the dewdrop; as distinct from it as the sun is from the dewdrop; to whom the countless worlds of immensity are as the primary particles of water composing the dewdrop are to the sun. Then add this thought: that He, around whose throne the morning stars for ever sing, to whom anthems of praise from all the star-choirs of immensity go toning on eternally from galaxy to galaxy, hears the evening hymn of praise in the Christian home, the lowly melody in the Christian heart, the sigh of the kneeling child; and, when the little task of his morning sojourn on earth is over, will draw up the Christian, as the sun draws up the dewdrop, to rest on the bosom of Infinite Love. Such is the universe, and such the God of the Christian, so far as these faint and feeble words can image them forth. Is the universe, is the God, of the pantheist, more sublime?

The essential point to be established against pantheism, so far as it is a theory of the nature of God and of duty, is the existence of a Divine Being, by whom existence is imparted to the finite, not in the way of emanation, but of creation, and of whose authority over reasoning beings the laws of morals are the expression. It would lead too far to attempt to present the general argument in support of this position ; but the evidence derived from the philosophy of morals,—the argument from conscience,—immediately concerns us, and may be alleged to be in itself conclusive. Of it, therefore, a few words.

The starting point in all discussions touching the nature and functions of conscience is for us moderns the doctrine of Butler. It is necessary clearly to define what that great moral philosopher effected. Mr Maurice, in one of his theological essays, has treated the matter in a way fitted to introduce perplexity and confusion where all was distinct, and to compromise or imperil one of the best ascertained and most precious achievements of the human intellect. Butler appealed to consciousness as to a fact in that inner world which consciousness surveys. Its evidence he treated as accurately parallel to that of the external senses “for the proof of things cognizable by them.” This is recognised by Mackintosh. “He occupies,” says the latter in reference to Butler, “the unassailable ground of an appeal to consciousness.” The fact which Butler pointed out as attested by consciousness is, that man possesses a conscience which decides upon action, and presides among the faculties. What inference may be drawn from this is another question. By precisely similar evidence to that which convinces man that he has a reasoning or an imaginative faculty, he is proved to have a faculty which judges of dispositions and actions ; whether he will accord conscience the place assigned it in the constitution of his nature, as he appoints to reason and imagination the work natural to them, is a subsequent consideration. Mr Maurice has lost the point of view from which Butler's doctrine of conscience can be apprehended. He does not perceive that Butler simply looks, with the eye of consciousness, into the inner world of mind, and registers his observation. The question between Butler and Combe, strangely, and to the disadvantage of both,* misconceived by Mr Maurice, is simply this : Is Psychology a real and possible science, or is it not ? As to the other matter on which Mr Maurice enlarges,—the liability of conscience to error,—that is also beside the point. Reason, blown upon by passion or blinded by prejudice, may arrive at false conclusions, but that its office is to weigh evidence is not doubted ; conscience may be liable to delusion, but it never ceases to speak with authority. Butler shows the highest point on which man can stand, in order, with his unaided powers, to see God ; but none knew better than he that this is but climbing to the top of a ruined tower, and that, though we can see farther than from the plain below, the only hope for man is that, gazing thence, he may perceive the dawning of the Sun of Righteousness.

The merit, strictly estimated, of Butler as a moral philosopher, consists in his having, by an interrogation of consciousness, vindicated the primary and independent character of the dictates of conscience. He thus rendered it impossible, by any conceivable elaboration, to establish a selfish theory of morals. He severed, once for all, the idea of virtue from the idea of happiness, whether of the individual, of the race, or of universal being. Conscience gives law to the wishing faculty, whether intensified in the throb of passion, or guided by cool and exhaustive calculation. Were an infinitude

* Combe would not object to Butler that he generalized hastily, but that he attempted generalization where it was impossible. In the world of matter, he would say, you observe a fact, and there an end ; in the so-called world of mind, you can observe none. The degree of caution and candour exercised in either case, on which Mr Maurice goes off, does not affect the dispute.

of advantage brought into competition with its demands, the consciousness would still be clear as to its unfaltering claim to obedience ; and we have merely to listen honestly to that consciousness in order to learn that the more advantage is opposed to conscience, the higher does our conception of the nobleness of moral triumph rise. "That your conscience approves of and attests to such a course of action, is itself alone an obligation." These words represent accurately what Butler has established. It is strange that Mackintosh, who evinces so genuine an appreciation of Butler, should have failed to perceive what precisely he had in view in such expressions as that now quoted. "The most palpable defect of Butler's scheme," says Mackintosh, "is, that it affords no answer to the question, 'What is the distinguishing quality common to all right actions?' If it were answered, 'Their criterion is, that they are approved and commanded by conscience,' the answerer would find that he was involved in a vicious circle ; for conscience itself could be no otherwise defined than as the faculty which approves and commands right actions." It was doubtless against a mistake of this kind that Butler was anxious to guard in denying to every other faculty the power to determine the decisions of conscience. What is the distinguishing quality common to all right actions ? It is that they are approved and commanded by conscience. What is conscience ? It is the faculty which discriminates among actions, carrying, as Butler says, "its own authority with it," and setting apart certain actions which are thus *constituted right. The designation "right" is not

* This word has given rise to astonishment and misconception even on the part of friendly critics. It has been supposed to yield the whole pantheistic position. This idea could have been entertained only from a failure to perceive the stage at which the argument has arrived, and to embrace it in its wholeness. I take up, first, the function of conscience among the faculties ; and then the source from which this function is derived. My sole object in discussing the former is to put in a clear light the import of earned until the stamp of conscience has been affixed, and there is no quality of rightness by reference to which conscience can be defined prior to its own decisions. The nobleman is one on whom a title of honour has been conferred by the sovereign; the sovereign is one empowered to confer titles of honour upon—noblemen? no, but certain persons selected to become noblemen. The error into which Mackintosh fell, and against which Butler studiously guards, is that of assigning the name before possession of the character. No action can become “right” to a man until it is approved by his conscience.

Are there now any grounds for believing that conscience acts in virtue of a divine commission,—that its authority, supreme among the human faculties, is delegated,—that it expresses the will of a personal God? There are.

In the first place, it seems probable that consciousness itself bears more or less implicit testimony to this effect. Butler himself held this opinion. The decision of conscience, he declared, “naturally, and always of course, goes on to anticipate a higher and more effectual sentence, which shall hereafter second and affirm its own.” This is an exceedingly important declaration on the part of one of the most calm and accurate thinkers that ever lived. It is followed, however, by the statement that “this part of the office of conscience” was beyond his design, and it cannot be alleged that Butler has done for the doctrine of a personal God what he did for the doctrine of a supreme conscience. Dr Chalmers offers a valuable contribution to the argument by which Butler’s preceding demonstration might be followed up, in the remark that conscience possesses “the power of summary execution, Butler’s statement, that conscience “is itself alone an obligation.” This opens the way to the further question, Is conscience a self-acting instrument, or is it the golden sceptre in the hand of God, whose touch marks off the right from the wrong?

both for the dispensation of rewards and the infliction of penalties,—an instant complacency in the act of well-doing, the bitterness of remorse in the retrospect of evil.” The phenomenon of remorse does not appear to be accountable for, except on the hypothesis of a God of whose displeasure conscience makes us aware. Are remorse and regret convertible terms? Every misuse of a faculty is attended with a certain measure of regret. The higher the advantage that might have been won, or the loftier the ascent in nobleness of character that might have been made, the more poignant will be this distress. But does not remorse imply something else incurred besides loss of gain, or of capacity, or of moral power? Does it not involve a decision dependent upon some foreign will,—a decision which seems fixed in the unalterable past, to which conscience compels assent, but which conscience claims no power to alter? Does it not whisper of guilt? Again, what is our idea of law? Much is suggested by this sentence of Locke: “Without a notion of a law-giver, it is impossible to have a notion of a law, and an obligation to observe it.” In days when extensive induction of physical uniformities has accustomed us to use the word “law” for mere regularity of sequence, there is risk of the introduction of confusing and bewildering influences into our minds when we inquire into our primary and originating notions of the thing. The human mind does not naturally own allegiance to abstractions. Man does not first think of himself as under a law to the Beautiful, the True, the Good, but as bound to obey a Lawgiver. The words of Locke express an instinct by which man finds in the law of conscience the authority of a Divine Power, the writing of the finger of God. When we turn to history, we appear on all hands to discover evidence that it is not natural for man to consider conscience immediately Divine, but to connect it with an irresistible, conscious, willing Power independent of himself.

Man has not been self-sufficing. Did the individual or the nation acknowledge sin and hear the rebuke of conscience? The hecatomb was straightway piled, the altar smoked : some external Power, believed capable, in what way soever, of sending forth a gentle message of pardon to calm and cool the troubled spirit, was appealed to. Did the simple tribe think it had done well? Did conscience give a favourable response? A claim was supposed to have been established on the god or gods. Before the eye, resting afar as on the still evening horizon of a troubled day, there beamed out Elysian fields, where rested virtuous heroes. There have been widely-extended systems of Pantheism, thought out by individuals, and nominally accepted by millions; but the popular mind, acting on pure instinct, rushed to the assertion of its own individuality, and that of its gods. The conception of man as self-complete, as a law to himself, as his own God, has been foreign to the mind of the race.

In the next place, or perhaps more strictly carrying out the same general train of thought in a particular direction, does not the voice of conscience connect itself, in a very close and intimate manner, with the great mental law of causation? As if impressed by God with a necessity of bearing testimony to His existence, everything within the realm of finitude, from Arcturus and the Pleiades to the moss that clings to the wall, presents itself with an irresistible power to compel reference to a cause. It is true that the action of conscience and will in determining conduct gives us more nearly an actual intuition of causal power than any force which we can trace in matter. But there are effects in the spiritual as well as in the material world. It is legitimate to find illustrations of the Divine power and wisdom in mind as well as in matter. God does not think, feel, imagine, in man; but every exercise of thought, every loveliness of feeling, every beauty of imagination, is an illustration of God's creative power. In no case can we rest in the finite. And when the entire mental organization is crowned by conscience,—when the most marvellous of finite existences, the human spirit, finds its law imposed, its development directed, the prophecy of its spiritual destiny folded up, in the decrees of the internal monitor,—do we not naturally expect that herein will be to us the closest of all intimations, the very herald and representative, of the great causal Spirit himself? All nature bears the stamp of its Maker; conscience names his very name.

Putting together what has been said, a comprehensive, though by no means exhaustive, conception of the polemic of monotheism, as against atheism on the one hand, and pantheism on the other, may now be formed. By an appeal to those faiths of reason which assert a cause for the phenomenal universe, and attest that cause to be not matter but mind, the theory that the All is a blind play of causeless and inconceivable forces is refuted, and the universe filled with spirit. By an assertion of the moral nature of man,—by an exhibition of the fact of moral obligation,—by an inspection of the idea of law,—the personality both of man and of God is elicited, the spirit of God is shown to be no vague pervasion of the universe with soul, but a living, willing, loving Person, who extends his authority over, and enters into converse with, the individual man.

The essential defect of pantheism as a moral system is its want of reality and of definiteness,—its inability positively to fix, positively to certify, anything. Its god is excogitated by what is found to be a strictly impossible exercise of thought. A single philosopher may persuade himself that the absolute being of which he talks is not absolute nothing; but even to him this being is an entity of thought, not of life; and to the first disciple who fairly asks himself what it is he believes, there remains a blank. The pantheist, owning no power or goodness in the universe with which he is not essentially one, is not entitled, when the facts of consciousness and the shapings of imagination fail him, to turn for an Infinite Holiness and an Infinite Power to faith. Strictly speaking, he can believe in no unseen,—in nothing beyond the external and the internal vision. His ideal will be rather a succession of brilliant but fleeting gleams,—a flickering dance of northern lights,—than a certain and unchangeable association of absolute perfection with omnipotent will.

It is because there is much that is noble in the pantheistic sentiment and tendencies of Fichte, Carlyle, and their school, that a confident appeal may be made to them in reference to this charge of indefiniteness. A vagueness fatal to practical use must for ever attach to moral speculation which does not preserve in clear inviolate integrity the personality of God, the personality of man, and the reality of virtue. A writer who exalts life over opinion, action over speculation, so earnestly as Mr Carlyle, is bound to consider this. Unless he does so, he cannot expect that earnest men will cordially and entirely accept even what is good in his writings. I bear my humble testimony to the effect that there is much good in them. It is a poor and perilous mistake to confound every form and degree of error under one sweeping condemnation. The morality of Fichte and Carlyle is incomparably superior to the morality of Epicurus, D'Holbach, or Comte. It is more. It is incomparably nobler than the morality of Paley and his disciples. Paley investigated certain of the external evidences of Christianity with a conclusiveness of success which it would be difficult to state too strongly. But the very apprehension of virtue, as an ascertained and independent fact, appears never to have dawned upon him. While doubtless a conscientious man, he found, in strict metaphysical language, no place for conscience in his moral philosophy. His definition of virtue points out accurately what virtue is not.

What is done "for the sake" of happiness, temporary or everlasting, cannot by possibility be virtue. It is a notable fact in the history of speculation, that, after Butler's demonstration of the place and functions of conscience, Paley should have written his Moral Philosophy. It is exceedingly surprising that this "virtue," motivated by happiness, should have been mistaken by an acute and honest man for that Christian virtue which is love and life, after Butler had said this:—"It is a great mistake to think you can love . . . anything from consideration that such love . . . may be a means of obtaining good or avoiding evil." It was well, if the pervasive Epicureanism of last century had invalidated the most sublime of human attributes, and obscured the very nature and meaning of holiness, that thinkers should arise to assert the free, unbought majesty of man, and to declare that there is something higher, infinitely higher, than happiness. Against materialism, against utilitarianism, Fichte and Carlyle enter their eloquent and mighty protest. But can they supply the wants they create, can they meet the aspirations they awaken? Have they any stable and consistent system of belief to oppose to the advancing tide of those errors? It is an opinion of Isaac Taylor, expressed in the Restoration of Belief, that atheism and Christianity are preparing to divide the world. In the era of physical science, indefiniteness may fascinate youth, but will not detain and satisfy men. In so much of Mr Carlyle's mental history as is before the world in his books, it is made plain that he has himself passed through stage after stage of moral development, until at last his readers may ask in dismay what it is he will have them believe. There was a day when he wrote eloquently in exposition and application of that doctrine of reason and understanding which Coleridge derived from Kant. The ideal of humanity, the reality of freedom, the great faiths which impart grandeur to man, had all their seat in the reason. In one of Mr Carlyle's last works, the Coleridgean distinction is made the subject of the most bitterly clever derision. But it is discovered that Mr Carlyle has still some mysterious grove, into which, when hit by the sun-shafts of argument, he can retire. Plain logic and everyday reasoning will not suffice to combat any doctrine of his. Coleridge called that region in the world of mind where those truths are rooted which the logical understanding can do no more than manipulate, the region of reason. It is now, I believe, recognised by most metaphysicians, that such a region exists. Mr Carlyle laughs at Coleridge, and must be supposed to have discarded Coleridge's Kantian views; but the more provoking is it to be invited into his own Dodona grove, and to have the puzzle proposed to us of fixing its name and nature. At the time when Mr Carlyle drew his belief from Fichte's Way to the Blessed Life, his opinions on most of the grand questions of moral philosophy and natural theology must have been comparatively definite. But every landmark of his belief has been gradually involved in a bewildering and cheerless haze. We put the question, What is the outlook for eternity? We learn that we cannot be assuredly answered,—that a look into the future is a look into a “great darkness.” We ask, What is virtue, and how are we to perform the duties of our station? Hints, laden with a fearful meaning, are thrown out to the effect that evil is but the necessary “shadow” of humanity; hero-worship is insisted on with never-flagging urgency; and a more and more express contradiction to every common idea of mercy, justice, and even truth,* urges the idea that the essential character of moral judgments is obliterated, and virtue confounded with mere force of intellect or will. When at last we earnestly demand, Who is the Lord, that we may serve him? we learn that even once-honoured pantheism is matter for a jest, we are refused any statement as to whether God is a person or not, and all we are informed concerning Him is that He is "inscrutable." A new proclamation of the worship of the Unknown God will hardly serve for the practical teaching of the world. From following the fair and fleeting mirages of Pantheism, men will turn to the sterile but definite negations of the positive philosophy.

With reference to Mr Carlyle's declaration that all inquiry touching the personality of God is to be dismissed,—that the subject is inscrutable,—it may be important to offer a remark in passing. The attitude assumed commends itself by a certain appearance of humility and reverence. But the question involved is of too urgent importance to admit of its being thus despatched. A personal God, a living God,—this, in point of fact, and nothing else than this, can be called a God at all. It is not enough that our instructor wear an expression of devoutness, if, preparatory to vanishing behind a luminous mist, he pronounces no distinct negative or affirmative on this point. The reverence must be spurious, the humility must be effeminate, which shrinks from a clear acknowledgment of God, and defrauds man of his highest glory. It does not honour God to make Him one with the Fate of Paganism or the infinite substance of Pantheism, and virtually to allege that His reasoning creatures cannot, or dare not, draw near to Him. It strips man of his highest glory,—it dis-crowns him as the privileged and excelling king of this lower world,—it forbids the most sublime exercise of reason, the most august act of freedom,—to declare that, as person with person, he cannot know and commune with his God. Contemplating the universe in its vastness, alit as it is with radiance, remembering that proximity is but relative, and that the particles of a sand-grain may to God appear no more in contact than the clustering galaxies whose distance from our world and from each other we cannot sum, it is in the power of the human mind, by an effort of abstraction, to figure it all as a bush, burning in the desert of immensity, to which the reasoning spirit, in hallowed awe, yet with a sublime confidence, may draw near to see its God. Let the shoes be from the feet ; let no rash or irreverent approach be made ; but let no human being shut his ear to the voice calling to him now, as to the Hebrew prophet of old. I will not reject the highest attribute of my humanity,—power to hear that voice. I will not go away saying the sight is too great for me, and indeed inscrutable. I will look because I am king of the earth, because my attributes of reason and freedom empower me to do so, and because the express commands of conscience are not to be put aside by any assumption of inability or unworthiness : I will look with silent reverence, because the God before whom I stand is infinite in holiness and in power.

But to return to a more direct prosecution of that line of thought on which we were proceeding. The vagueness of the modern Pantheistic teaching deprives it, I repeat, of all practical value. The almost spasmodic earnestness of its spirit,—its testimony to the all-importance of religion,—its defensive attitude against the great materialist and utilitarian heresies,—pledge those who abide by it to give due consideration to this charge. While appealing to us on behalf of religion on the one hand, and rejecting Christianity on the other, Mr Carlyle is bound to satisfy us that, on his hypothesis, religion is possible. The spirit of religion, he declares, is immortal, but its form is perpetually changing : all forms in which it can be embodied must change. Mr Carlyle would admit the necessity of associating religion with form ; only he regards this association as essentially temporary. A very slight effort of calm reflection will convince us that the perpetuation of religion on these terms is impossible,—that it would of necessity either congeal into the hard negation of atheism, or evaporate in a vague spiritualistic illumination. The question is simply this : Can a religion subsist of which the forms are known to be allegorical ? Not only can no instance be found in history of the worship of an incarnated moral or spiritual idea, when the form of incarnation was avowed to be delusive, but we are conscious to ourselves that no man could worship what he knew to be a temporary expedient. If the fundamental forms of the Christian religion, the Unity and the Trinity of the Godhead, the atonement by the Son, the application by the Spirit, are held to body forth certain ideas, men may eliminate, elaborate, appreciate, and admire them, but they will never worship them. In fact, every real believer in a religion, and pre-eminently every believer in Christianity, would demur to any such distinction between form and truth as is here drawn. The forms of Christianity just named are its essential facts. There can be no accommodation between life and idea ; there can be no transposition of facts of existence and facts of knowledge or of moral law. Philosophy and religion cannot become one : the object of philosophy is abstract truth, existent only in relation to the thinking mind ; the object of religion is essential life, the fountain of power, the source of finitude. Inform men of the esoteric secret that the imputation of life to the Divinity is the subtle, self-deceiving form in which they express their respect for certain principles, and they will never again bend the knee.

These are not days, and our island is emphatically not the place, when and where systems of philosophical belief are worked out with consistent logic and accepted with entire belief. The crumbling of the great ontological structures of German speculation in the last century, and the mere hurry, versatility, and practical activity of the present time, lead men rather to snatch whatever fragment of truth may be flung in their way, to adopt whatever maxim is ready and serviceable, to trust to impulse and intuition. Mr Carlyle would care comparatively little though any philosophical doctrine with which his sentiments were said to be in vital connection were refuted. He would bid us leave speculating and philosophizing, and turn to life. But is it not precisely in this sphere that the most forcible appeal may be made against teaching, of which the practical outcome must be the cessation of all that mankind have known as religion? "It is easily proved," says Jonathan Edwards, "that the highest end and happiness of man is to view God's excellences, to love Him, and receive expressions of His love. This love, including all those other affections which depend upon and are necessarily connected with it, we express in worship. The highest end of society among men, therefore, must be to assist and join with each other in this employment. But how comes it to pass that this end of society was never yet obtained among deists? Where was ever any social worship stately performed by them? And, were they disposed socially to express their love and honour, which way would they go about it? They have nothing from God to direct them. Doubtless there would be perpetual dissensions about it, unless they were disposed to fall in with the Christian model. We may be convinced, therefore, that revelation is necessary to right social worship." It will not be denied that it has amounted almost, or altogether, to an impossibility to sustain the practice of religion where any form of rationalism has prevailed. Is not this the natural result of a transference of religion from the domain of conscience to that of reason, from that of revelation to that of opinion, from that of faith to that of science? Neither a man himself, nor a man's fellow, can create or excogitate for him a God. In the mere process of excogitation, that element of infinite reverence and awe which is of the nature of religion will escape. The man becomes a reasoner, a theoriser, an arguer, but not a worshipper. His God is stripped of authority. The fear of God is not in his breast ; the love of God can have no dwelling there. A subtle atheism, more or less noble, is his real religion. When temptation does not press, it may lend the character certain fair hues of purity, disinterestedness, or spiritual enthusiasm. When strong temptation assails the soul,—when any of those terrible powers which ever slumber in the human breast awake,—it will pass away like a film. It is no such easy matter to frame a religion which will make men tremble, or weep, or work. It is no such easy thing to fetter cupidity, ambition, or lust. Mr Leigh Hunt suggests a Religion of the Heart. I know the work only from reliable indirect sources, but its name reveals its nature. The religion of the heart ! The cure of human ills, the satisfaction of human doubt, the vanquishing of human SIN, by an appeal to the finer feelings, by the gentle influence of a meek sentimentality ! Has Mr Hunt set forth his theory to Mr Carlyle, and endeavoured to make him a proselyte ? The interview would have been worth the theatrical exhibitions of a season. How did the sardonic painter of the French Revolution look upon the proposed Palingenesia ? Was it with inextinguishable laughter, or with a glance of burning fire, or with melancholy, unutterable scorn ? He knows the world is not a cloud-film. He knows that men are not wax figures, whose cheeks can be painted by a delicate, lady-like hand. He might tell us that the lion of the desert, with the madness of hunger in his eye, may be tamed by sweetened milk and water ; that the raging volcano, which has torn up the welded earth, and is hurling its flaming fragments at the sky, may be lulled by the song of the soft west wind or the waving of a lady's fan ; that the chafed surges of ocean may pause, and bow placidly their heads, when the maiden prays them, in mild accents, to spare her lover ; but that man is to be charmed by no gentle music, that man is a creature of battle and of blood, that the Furies and the tempests but faintly image the savageness of his mood, and that all absurdities pall before that which regards him as reclaimable by honeyed words. There is but one thing in this universe that will overmaster the spirit of man : the sight of God laying hold of His thunderbolts !

The Positive Philosophy, the serried ranks, that, consciously or unconsciously, follow the dark guidance of Mammon and Atheism, are advancing. Say not Atheism cannot for a time prevail. Even now the Fiend may be filling his chalice in the fire of hell, to pour it on our heads in some agony of national horror, like that of the French Revolution. Atheism has ere now led nations captive ; and a theory of atheism so plausible, so temperate, so seemingly innocent and benign, was never advocated in the world before. Are we to oppose it by the like of Mr Hunt's Religion of the Heart ? Or even by sublime but indefinite apostrophes to duty, and reverence, and hero-worship, and the divine silences ? If one might respectfully draw an inference from the tone of Mr Carlyle's late works, one might think that he is aware of some deficiency of force, and has a sad foreboding as to how the battle is to go.

A glance at past history, and at the present state of the world, reveals to us here two perils which we dare not overlook. The one is superstition, the other licentiousness.

It will not be in the power of atheism to extinguish the religious instinct : but it may confine its manifestation to barbarous and debasing forms. If we drive away from us religion, when arrayed in the spotless robe of Christianity ; if we will insist that we can devise for ourselves, with the aid of reason and science, better rules of action and modes of life than are afforded by that gospel which even its enemies allow to stand pre-eminent among the institutions of men ; we will find religion, by unalterable necessity, re-appearing amongst us, but now in a polluted garment, and bearing a curse rather than a blessing. Is there no lesson for the age in our Agapemones and Mormonisms? Do they not prove the desperate and reckless yearning of the human heart after faith in God?—a yearning not to be appeased by the removal of all religious education, not to be satisfied by sensual joys, and which, if there is no true religion in which it can rest, will always call forth for itself some humiliating and baneful form of superstition.

The second peril, that of licentiousness, is no distant possibility, no slight and permissible evil. Against this the calculating prudence of materialist or utilitarian morality would be utterly inefficient. To restrain, indeed, any of the living and powerful forces in the human breast, these would not avail: Superstition would break asunder their green withes, on the one hand; and Passion, on the other, would snap their flaxen cords as with the might of fire. And it is not a little mysterious how a spiritualism so high-toned and lofty as to be removed above the common apprehension of men, and alleging all thought of reward or punishment immeasurably beneath the serene dignity of its virtue, can yet look with indulgence, or at least with tolerance, upon foul incontinence! If there is one form of iniquity beyond another which all pure-minded and patriotic men ought now to unite in opposing, it is this. It might be a question whether there is a sin possible to a writer, which no conceivable amount of genius is sufficient to induce us to pardon. If such there be, it is that committed in the works of Byron. We can bear with him in all his petulance and scorn, in his unhealthy egotism and half-conscious affectation; one star-glance of his Muse will cast a redeeming light over all that: but, if we see him dragging in the very mire the pinions of that Muse, and heaping foul ashes on her head, how can we pardon him? We may have a certain sympathy with him, as we mark his regal port, though his aspect and fierce demeanour seem to speak defiance to God and man; but we cannot pardon him when we see him, a vile toad, squat at the ear of youth and purity, instilling foul poison. We may own a grandeur in Cain, and have a word to say even for the Vision of Judgment; but Don Juan must be flung upon the dunghill. I never can think of the state of the Roman Empire in its decline, without seeming to trace certain analogies between its state and that of Europe in the present day: one at least of the great causes which then enervated the race, and fitted it to be trodden in the dust by the strong men of the North, is now in operation over Europe. And if Atheism and Mammon once do their work, the judgments of God may again awaken to burn up a polluted and enfeebled people! When the carcass of a nation lies dead, tainting the solar system, there will not want lightnings to kindle its funeral pyre!

Christianity fulfils accurately all those requirements which we vainly make upon the pantheistic spiritualism of the day. By the mere fact that miracle enters as an essential element into its evidence, it asserts the authority of the Lord of nature. It claims assent to its truth, but it claims worship for its God. It is frankly to be conceded that the miraculous element in its evidence could not stand alone. If it did so, the authority of revelation would be arbitrary, the freedom of the human being would be infringed, the personality of man would be overpowered by absolute will. But unless it was present, the truths of speculative intellect, and the generalizations of moral law, could not be indissolubly associated with creative power and Divine life. Truth is the evidence of philosophy: truth and miracle combine to attest religion. Christianity, incarnated in Christ, was a revelation of the Truth: God spake by miracle from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, hear Him. Association of a code of moral excellence with efficient Power and active Will to guarantee its realization, accompanies Christianity throughout; as its appeal was made at first, not only to its immaculate mo-als, but to the authority of a miracle-working God, so its entire and ultimate appeal must in all ages be, not only to a system of religious truth, but to that perpetual miracle of the Spirit's work by which, in ever-renewed spring and harvest,—in perennial freshness of amaranthine flower and celestial fruit,—the moral law of Christianity is incarnated in Christian life.

The miraculous evidence of Christianity does not come within that train of argument which it was determined here to follow. From the attack upon what is in a sense justly called the external evidence of Christianity, an attack which was very vigorously maintained during last century, the rejectors of Christianity have turned to assail its ethical doctrines. As to the matter of fact, to be determined by simple processes of historical investigation and inductive reasoning, whether the promulgation of Christianity was attended by miracle, Paley argued, I believe, conclusively. The question was one for a competent historical jury; and Paley was exactly the man to sum up before such a jury. The substantial facts upon which he proceeded have remained beyond reach of doubt; and for honest, clear-minded men, firm in the conviction that philosophical theory cannot obliterate actual fact, and biassed and bewildered by no hypothesis of world-development, his interpretation of them will be satisfactory. But it is enough here that the place of miracle in the scheme of Christian evidence be pointed out,—that the function of miracle, as investigated by reason, be shown to be a natural, legitimate, and, in fact, indispensable one, in the establishment of a religion. The object mainly in view at present is to exhibit the superiority of Christian revelation to any ethical teaching of the pantheistic school; and for this purpose we have to enquire what it is that Christianity informs us as to God and duty.

The Bible, by many and explicit declarations, affirms that God cannot, in essence, be known to man. By no searching can Jehovah be found out unto perfection. He is the I AM, whom no eye hath seen or can see. His power is infinite ; his perfection is absolute ; but it is not upon any ability of the human mind to conceive Him, that His existence or His attributes depend. He is not a God constructed or devised by aggregation of moral or intellectual ideas ; when reason has done its best to comprehend Him, faith still believes in a light that is inaccessible and full of glory.

But when Paul professed to reveal to the Athenian sages the Unknown God, whom they “ignorantly” worshipped, he made no vain boast. He could inform them with absolute accuracy how they, as finite beings, stood related to Him, what He approved and disapproved, what, so far as they could know Him, He was. The truth, so far as revealed, was absolute ; the limit to its revelation was in the capacity of man, not in the nature of God.

The Bible brings God, so to speak, near man,—enables man to feel that he can have converse with Him as person with person,—in two ways : first, by the divine intimation that man is formed in the image of God ; and, second, by the incarnation of the Godhead in the man Christ Jesus.

The passage in which it is announced that God created man in His own image occurs at the outset of revelation, and is fundamental to its whole scheme. In recognising himself as a person, in being conscious of himself as a spiritual being, endowed with conscience and will, man makes a nearer approach than through the most extended inquisition of nature, to the conception of a living God. If man could perfectly realize to himself his original nature, he would have before him the perfect reflection of infinitude in the mirror of finite being. It is this fundamental truth that imparts any worth to the efforts of the human mind, unassisted by revelation, to body forth a conception of God. It empowers us to avail ourselves of every natural manifestation in which Pantheism arrays its imagined God,—every tint of natural beauty, every trait of human nobleness,—and, though with cautious hand, to set it in its true position in the system of things, as a means of revealing the Christian God, of strengthening our faith, of deepening our adoration. But the Bible does not leave us under the necessity which presses inexorably upon Pantheism, of confining our knowledge of God solely to an elaboration from human qualities and physical manifestations. It avoids the peril of anthropomorphic error, by denying that man now corresponds to his original type. It represents the Divine image in man, though not altogether erased, as yet, to use the words of Calvin, “confused, broken, and defiled.” But it presents an unsullied representation of God in humanity in the person of Jesus Christ. The school of infidelity with which we are at present concerned has expressed profound veneration for the character of Christ. “It is in point of fact true,” says Fichte, “what the first part of the Christian dogma asserts, that Jesus of Nazareth is, in a quite peculiar manner, and one wholly inapplicable to any other individual, the only-begotten and first-born Son of God.” Had Jesus not lived upon earth, the conceptions formed by Fichte of the moral nature of God and of man would assuredly have never been arrived at. But we must take the account of the nature of the God-man as Christ gave it, and as his disciples understood it, not as Fichte, with a mockery of Biblical interpretation, exhibited it. The man Christ Jesus was distinguished from other men, not, as Fichte imagines, by a peculiarly vivid consciousness of a common Divinity, but by being alone the unsullied image, in a human form, of an invisible, personal God. In Him we know as much of God as finite minds can. His moral attributes we have revealed in absolute, eternal perfection. In the depths of Divine infinitude there is nothing more Divine than the holiness of Christ. The essential mysteries of infinite power and life Christ did not, indeed, enable us to comprehend. But He exhibited the moral ideal in Divine and infinite purity, manifesting itself under the conditions of humanity ; and He assured us of the fact of a power that could control nature, by putting such forth in works of miracle. The might of the ocean and the tempest, the strength of the everlasting hills, the silent beaming forth, as in ever renewed miraculous "vision," of the splendour and opulence of summer, the illumination of immensity by worlds, may offer some faint idea of the going forth of the power of Omnipotence ; but there is a still more impressive, and, as it were, present manifestation of supernatural power made to man, when the storm sinks quelled before the eye of Jesus, or the dead comes from the grave at his word. And as such power is beyond human conception, so the moral perfection of Christ is apart from, and unparalleled by, all actual human attainment. When the heart expands with a love that embraces the whole circle of sentient existence, or even, by the bounteous imagining of poetic sympathy, first breathes an ideal life into flower and tree, and then over them, too, sheds with Wordsworth, the smile of glowing tenderness, we may remember that there still linger traces of the Divine image in man, and faintly imagine the streaming forth of that Love which brightens the eyes of the armies of heaven, and gives light and life to the universe ; but can any manifestation of human tenderness bring to us such a feeling of God's love as one tear of Jesus shed over Jerusalem, or one revering look into His eye when, in the hours of mortal agony, it overflowed in love and prayer for His murderers ? We can attach a true and noble meaning to the words of Fichte when he bids us watch the holy man, because in what he "does, lives, and loves," God is revealed to us ; but any instance of human heroism is faint and powerless in enabling us to form a conception of the holiness of God, when compared with the devotion to His Father's service of Him Whose meat and drink it was to do the will of God, and Who died on the cross to make atonement for sin. And if, in addition to all this, Christianity tells us of a Divine Spirit, whose mysterious but certain influence on the mind enables it to discern a glory and a beauty in the Saviour incomparably more exalted than can otherwise be distinguished, how truly may we assert that it brings us into a closer nearness to the Divine, than the most ethereal dreaming of mystic trance, or the most gorgeous imagining of pantheistic poetry !

Respecting human duty as laid down in the Christian scheme, it is not necessary to say anything more than that the Christian must become as Christ. Two laws are pointed out as schoolmasters to bring men to Him. The one was delivered by Moses, and constituted a moral ideal which the Jews never did, and mankind never could, realize ; the other is the law of natural conscience, on the authority of which Paul appealed to the Romans, and by the witness of which also the whole human race would stand condemned before God. Neither of these brought or can bring salvation. That is obtained only when the believer is united to Christ, and the transformation of his nature, in accordance with the life of Christ, through the Spirit, has commenced.

And this brings us to the last arena on which the issue between the school of Fichte and Carlyle and the disciples of Christ can be tried. The most momentous problem of the individual life is before us. Mr Carlyle has not hesitated to use the word "conversion ;" and in the works of Fichte we can very distinctly recognise a theory of the thing.

According to the writers named, it is seemly and right, if not in all cases necessary, that, at a certain stage of the personal history, the mind awaken and bestir itself, and struggle as in throes of birth or tumult of departure ; that for a time it wrestle with doubt, or cower trembling under the wings of mystery, searching earth and heaven for answers to its questions, and satisfaction for its wants ; that there be a turning, in baffled and indignant loathing, from the pleasures of sense, as all inadequate either to still or satisfy new and irrepressible longings after the Good, the True, the Beautiful, after God, freedom, immortality. Our language probably contains no example of the delineation of mental confusion and dismay to be compared with Mr Carlyle's description of such a period in Sartor Resartus. In this time of distraction and unrest, calm thought and manly action are alike suspended ; the quiet of the soul is broken ; around it seem to hang curtains of thick cloud, streaked with fire, shutting it, in gloomy solitude, from heaven's light above, and the voices of human sympathy around. Mr Carlyle shows us how a soul may emerge from this confusion and distress to noble and perfect manhood ; how it may once more feel around it the fresh breath of the open sky, and over it the clear smile of heaven ; how the streams of thought may again flow on in melodious harmony, and the wheels of action obey their impulse ; how perfect content is to be regained with one's position in the system of things ; how all fear and torment are to give place to blessedness ; how love is again to suffuse the world, and over every cloud of mystery to be cast a bow of peace.

Christianity likewise recognises in the individual life a period of unrest and disquietude ; it may be, of tribulation and dismay. It is the period preceding conversion. It is, indeed, by no means necessary that in every case there occur this tumultuous crisis of internal life. Mr Carlyle declares that the ultimate lesson of manhood may be taught by the mild ministries of domestic wisdom and love, even better than "in collision with the sharp adamant of Fate ;" and so the change which is wrought in the soul by vital Christianity may be silent and gradual as a cloudless dawn, unobserved by any human eye until the new light wraps the whole character, touching all its natural gifts with immortal beauty, and turning the cold dews of night into liquid radiance. In order, however, to define clearly and discriminate firmly the stages in the change, it may be well to contemplate it in a case similar to that presented by Mr Carlyle in Sartor Resartus.

Let us conceive one who has hitherto been a Christian but in name, suddenly pausing and beginning to give earnest heed to the spiritual concerns which he has deemed of trivial importance. Suppose him to be affected in a twofold manner : by a sense of personal uneasiness,—of what Fichte names “torment,”—of present self-accusation and prospective alarm ; and by doubt and dismay in consideration of human sorrow, and the mysterious and appalling destiny which, as he learns from Christianity, awaits a portion of the human race. The first of these may be indicated by the general name, fear ; the second is an inability to assent to the fact of Divine justice. The first will agitate most strongly minds not of a noble natural temper ; the second is often found to rack with keen agony men of generous and benignant dispositions. The second may indeed be absent altogether ; but it may be doubted whether the final attainment and rest in this case will be so lofty, pure, and beautiful, as in the other. Let it be supposed, however, that the mind is in extreme tumult and anguish ; how is it that Christianity professes to restore tranquil happiness, and recall healthful activity ? The question will be answered presently ; but first we must have some idea how the same effect is aimed at by Fichte and Carlyle.

Perhaps in no case do the tremulous delicacy and subtle pride of the day come out more strongly than in our modes of regarding all that relates to fear in religious matters ; and perhaps in no other case does the power of Christianity to lay its hand on the heart of the race, and its way of coming in contact with life and reality, contrast so boldly with the fine-spun, flattering, but evanescent theories of a haughty philosophy. The history of the world abundantly testifies that a religion altogether dissociated from fear is emasculated and unavailing ; the state of Greece in its decline, of Rome under the Cæsars, of the Italian republics of the fifteenth century, shows what is that guardianship exercised over the national virtues, by a religion which has become a sentiment or a debate, which has laid aside its terrors, and passed into the school of the philosopher or the studio of the artist. In the teaching of Christianity there is, and has always been, an element, and a prevailing element, of fear.

Fichte, in characterizing that state of the mind which precedes conversion, does not expressly mention fear ; he uses the general term, torment, and regards this as nature's monition to leave self and sensuality, and turn to the Divine. Torment, with him, is the stirring of the divine principle within, and the expression of its unrest and embarrassment in the bonds of sense ; but whence it has arisen that this discipline is necessary for the human soul,—why the throes of divine birth must agonize us,—why the beginning is anguish, when joy, which is the companion of perfection, the guerdon of genius, is the progress and the end,—we learn not from his philosophy. Fichte, when his terms are rightly interpreted, defines, with a certain correctness, the office of fear ; of its origin, save perhaps some assertion of necessity, he gives no theory. Mr Carlyle, on the other hand, refers expressly to fear. His hero, in the time of his unrest, “lived in a continual, indefinite, pining fear.” The way in which Mr Carlyle, in the ultimate attainment of rest by his wanderer, disposes of this fear, is one of the most sadly interesting points in his writings. Drawn by the force of intense human sympathy and fiery insight, into a more intimate knowledge of the actual feelings of the soul than the lofty philosophic enthusiasm of Fichte's speculation enabled that writer to attain, he seems to indicate the element of a regard to futurity as entering into the anguish which oppresses the awakening and aspiring soul. "The wanderer attains true manhood by finally triumphing over fear, not only fear of anything on earth, but fear "of Tophet too ;" by casting a defiant glance around this universe, and daring any existent power to make him afraid. We are aware of no voice reaching him from heaven, to whisper of pardon and invite to peace ; we see no hand stretched out to remove sin or impart purity ; by one tremendous effort of will he rids himself of terror, and declares that if hell must be dared, it must. Some time after this achievement he discovers that nature is God, that he himself is part of the Divinity ; we might say that, having shown himself brave, he had vindicated his right to his natural birth-right, and might boldly lay claim to his inherent divinity. There is sublimity in this spectacle of a finite being defying the terrors of Tophet ; there is a grandeur in the aspect of him who, a few short years ago a weeping infant in his cradle, and in a few more fleeting years to be so still under his green hillock, thus, in the brief path between, hurls indignant scorn at the terrors of infinitude. But was it not such a sublimity which rested on the brow of Moloch, in the glare of hell's battlements ? Such a sublimity, methinks, was in the eyes of Eblis, where pride waged eternal conflict with despair, as he sat on his globe of fire. "Let the world insult our feebleness ; there is no cowardice in capitulating with God." I shall not affirm that Mr Carlyle puts into the mouth of his hero a deliberate defiance of the Almighty ; but he assuredly represents the soul, in the great crisis of individual life, as trusting solely to its own energies for deliverance,—the terrors which encompass it as drawing off at the determined hest of human will, not by Divine permission or commandment,—the saviour of man, as himself. As to the ultimate origin of the discipline of sorrow, Mr Carlyle gives us no more satisfaction than Fichte. In fact, in all essential points, these writers are on this whole subject at one.

When we turn to Christianity, it seems impossible to fail to note an access of clearness, and what might be styled an agreement with the general symmetry of nature. Whence this torment of self-accusation and alarm? It arises, says Christianity, in its strictly personal reference, from a twofold source; from a sense of imperfection, and a consciousness of guilt. This last word is not named by Mr Carlyle or Fichte; yet surely history, reason, and conscience authorize us to impute to it a weighty significance. Why is it that in every age man has striven to propitiate his God? What mean those altars whose smoke lies so darkly along human history,—the shrieks of those children whom they pass through the fire to Moloch? What spectre is that which the human eye has always seen setting a crown on the head of Death, a crown of terrors? Most explicitly and conclusively of all, what is the word which reason utters, when compelled, by its very nature, to seek a cause for this torment, whose existence is granted? Are we not, by complicated and overpowering evidence, led to acknowledge the fact, however mysterious, of guilt? It may be that this result is one of exhaustless melancholy; but, alas! our tears will not wipe out the statutes of the universe; and the man of real fortitude will, of all things, scorn intellectual legerdemain, and refuse to accept no fact. Of a sadness not so profound, but still sad, is the other source of personal anguish,—the sense of imperfection,—recognised at this stage by Christianity. It is this on which Mr Carlyle and Fichte lay stress, but without giving it any explanation, and virtually or expressly regarding it as natural and right. It is the awakening sense in the bosom of man that he is a stranger here, an exile from a home where a spirit could expatiate; it is the dim agony that comes with returning consciousness, when he begins to perceive the iron grating, and the chain, and the couch of straw, and when the eye which he turns towards the azure is pained and dazzled by the once natural light. Better is this agony, because it is the pain of one returning to consciousness, reason, and health, than any wild dreams of maniac joy; yet it too is unnatural; and no theory of man's life is anywhere satisfactory which tells us not how it became necessary, how the imperfection which causes it originated, how man came into that dungeon. Christianity affords a simple, natural, and adequate explanation, both of the guilt and the imperfection, by its doctrine of the fall. So profoundly does the theory that man is now in a state of lapse and distemper agree with all that can be gathered from consciousness and history; so perfectly does it explain the glory of his sadness, and the sadness of his glory; so definitely does it intimate why the prostrate column and the shattered wall show a mind in ruin, while yet the gold, and gems, and ivory that shine amid the fragments hint that it was once an imperial mansion; so well does it explain the sublime home-sickness which has led earth's loftiest sons, despising all that grew on a soil accursed,—that pleasure by which sense strove to wile away the faint reminiscences of other scenes, that wealth which but represented the perpetual struggle against death,—to go aside from the throng, and seek the joys of spirit and the embrace of truth in lonely thought and contemplation; so satisfactorily does it harmonize the loveliness of the dawn and the horror of the battle-field as existing in one world; that it seems worthy to be ranked among profound mysteries that it can at all be called in question. As to the origin of evil, it may be frankly conceded that the problem contains elements beyond reach of human solution. But by preserving inviolate the ideas of personality, freedom, moral obligation, Christianity presents the only conditions under which it can be conceivably solved. It respects, too, the terrible and momentous facts of the problem.

It shows evil to be a dread reality, but God to be infinitely above it. Pantheism either explains evil away, puts out the eye of conscience, i. e., smashes its telescope to save its faith, or opens the way to Manicheism.

Christianity recognises as seasonable, and accounts for, the action of fear on the human mind, which is unable to feel itself at peace with God. How does it remove it? Does it enjoin a calculation of advantage? Does it declare that a certain amount of duty performed on the compulsion of terror will avert danger, or say that it is possible to perform one virtuous action on this compulsion? The Christian scheme of morals does not recognise as deserving the name of virtue what is produced by any external motive, what has not its root in the heart. This it intimates in a twofold manner: by express declarations, and by the whole nature of that salvation which it offers to man. It explicitly declares that the glory of God is to be in all cases the unconditional motive of action, the deep and all-pervading spring of life. And the whole tenor of its descriptions of that salvation which it proclaims renders the idea of its morality being produced by external inducement absurd; it demands a new birth, a new creation, a new life; upon no action will it set its seal of approbation, unless it is the fruit of the Spirit, and springs from holiness and truth in the inward parts. Scripture being thus clear and decided, it might be well to know to what extent theologians have given colour to the charge that Christianity is thus selfish. The mode in which certain Christian writers of last century wrote did, to some extent, lend it countenance; the enforcement of virtue by rewards and punishment was, it is probable, too exclusively insisted on; the school of Paley did tend to give Christianity rather the aspect of a mechanism than of a life, did rather seek for it a place beside a refined Epicureanism, than claim for it its right and natural position in a more lofty and ethereal region than was ever reached by the sublimest speculation of Platonism. But we need have no hesitation in claiming for the Puritan theology a freedom from any such error; and in the conclusion of the second chapter of the first book of Calvin's Institutes, we have his express declaration that, were there no hell, yet, since the Christian loves and reveres God as a Father, the dread of offending Him would alone suffice to render him abhorrent of vice. Fear does not produce virtue; the fact that a man refrains from sin to avoid the punishment of hell, is no proof that he is converted. Yet fear is not without a function in the system of things. It bears not the wedding garment; and no hand but that of the Divine Spirit, working faith in the Christian, and so enabling him to appropriate that garment, and clothe himself in it, can effect in him that renovation which leads to godly action and spiritual joy; but it goes out into the highways of a blighted and delirious world, and there, like a terrible prophet of the wilderness, who foretells the coming of the mild Redeemer, startles and arouses men. Its office is preliminary, external, awakening; it is the beginning of wisdom. Since, indeed, on this earth, the deep-lying disease which renders it necessary is never altogether removed, its warning voice is never altogether silent; but the humiliating remedy will vanish utterly with the disease of which it is a sign, and by which it became necessary; when the Christian goes to take his place among the angelic choirs, he will be able to join them in a melody that is only love; and it does not admit of doubt, that every feeling of slavish fear with which any being regards God, is strictly of the nature of sin.

By fear, or by whatever means the Spirit of God may employ, the soul is brought to lie down in perfect abasement before God, to acknowledge its want, its woe, its weakness, and its unreserving consent to receive all from His hand. This is what, in the Christian scheme, corresponds to the "renunciation" of Goethe and Carlyle; now is the soul brought to that stage of utter desolation and bareness which agrees with the critical stage of the wanderer's trouble. We are here at the point where one essential element in the Christian scheme is revealed ; we come within sight of its great distinctive virtue, humility. Now is it that the sinful finite being, to use the words of Pascal, "makes repeatedly fresh efforts to lower himself to the last abysses of nothingness, whilst he surveys God still in interminably multiplying immensities ;" this is what Vinet pronounces the end of all Christian preaching, "to cast the sinner trembling at the foot of Mercy." In the melodious yet heart-wrung wailings which float down the stream of ages from the harp of the poet-king of Israel, the feelings of such moments found expression ; such feelings were in the heart of the Pilgrim, when, fleeing from the City of Destruction, and fainting under his burden, he knelt with clasped hands before the Cross ; and it was in this same attitude that the New England Puritan, in utter self-abandonment and feeling of the majesty and holiness of God, judged himself worthy of damnation, and had scarce power to pray. It is but the unqualified acknowledgment that man, as he exists in this world, requires the aid of Divine power to raise him to that higher state of being to which he aspires. It is the disrobing of itself by the soul of all the raiment of human virtue ; which, however pure and beautiful it may seem to earthly eyes, is not that spiritual glory which will beam more fair in its immortality, when the earth will have faded away, and all that framework of society which gives occasion and play to so much of the virtue that is between man and man, shall have been gathered in by death, alike its origin and its end. It is the confession that, however the soul of man may wing the atmosphere of earth, it has now no pinions on which to ascend into the sunless serenity of celestial light.

And now speech must give place to silence, nor any attempt be made to define the new birth of the Spirit. "In what way," says Coleridge, "or by what manner of working, God changes a soul from evil to good, how He impregnates the barren rock with priceless gems and gold, is to the human mind an impenetrable mystery in all cases alike." Only this may be said, that by faith the soul lays hold of, and unites itself to, Jesus, finding in Him all that for which it has sought; His mysterious sacrifice sufficient to make atonement for guilt, His righteousness a spotless robe in which it may sit for ever at the banquet of the Almighty King, His name the harmonizing of all contradiction, the solving of all doubt, the open secret of the universe.

In a passage which he who has once read can hardly have forgotten, so softly pathetic is it, so richly and melodiously beautiful, Mr Carlyle sets, as it were, to lyric music the joy of the wanderer's heart when he attains final peace. The inheritance of the Christian is likewise peace, though of another nature from that which visited the scathed heart of Teufelsdröckh. This is no proud ecstasy of self-assertion, no rapture of philosophic dream; on the Christian, from the eternal heavens, there now streams down the smile of a living Eye. The emotions which befit his state have, from the olden time, been voiced in a mild anthem, whose divine simplicity and angelic music are beautiful as the morning star, and to which we may imagine the saints of God, in the future eternity, attuning their harps, when memory wanders back to the little earth, and they think of that humility which is the highest glory of the finite. "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want." The peace of the Christian is to feel the circling of Jehovah's arms, as he lies in the light of His countenance.

I add but a few fragmentary remarks, which readers must regard as partial indications of what might be said, rather than as any unfolding of the momentous and inspiring themes to which they relate. It might be profitable fully to discuss, first, the ethical value of this theory of conversion in that precise point where it contrasts with pantheism ; next, the mode in which it tranquillizes the mind which is agitated by a sense of the sorrowful mysteries of human destiny, and the dark paths of Divine justice ; thirdly, the Christian theory of work ; and, lastly, the Christian theory of heaven. Only a few words can be offered on each.

I accept from the hands of Mr Carlyle and Goethe the far-trumpeted doctrine of self-renunciation ; I listen to Fichte, and to the whole of that lofty spiritualistic school of which he may be considered the head, and bear witness to their emphatic and eloquent proclamation of the sin and blasphemy of selfishness ; and I calmly assert, that it is in Christian conversion alone that real self-renunciation is attained, that self is actually conquered. Of all that holds of pantheism,—of the genius-worship of the day,—of the idealistic or emotional religiosity now so common,—of all which professes to work in the human bosom a benign and self-conquering revolution by the evolving of any hidden nobleness lying there, or reference to any perfect internal light previously obscured,—it is to be alleged that it fails to approach the root of the evil. When laid down in the most perfect and plausible philosophic form, these views are thus powerless ; and, in application to practical life, the perils which encompass them are obvious and unavoidable. To denounce the sensual life is no great achievement or novelty in ethics ; a moderately enlightened Epicureanism has always done that. But how can I apply the term “self-renunciation” to an act which is really and merely the assertion of self, of spiritual self, that is ? What is this more than the purchase of a lofty and delicious pride, by the sacrifice of the garbage of sense ? Self, on every such theory, leaves the coarse dwelling of sensual pleasure, but it is only to rear for its own royal abode a palace of gold and cedar. And if the commands of a serene spiritualism may, in the case of the philosopher, repel the advances of sense, who that has ever cast his eye over life can refuse to concede that they would be all unheeded on that wild arena? while the absence of any precise definition or applicable test of the spiritual and divine in the individual breast, would leave a broad avenue, the more inviting that it was lined by academic plane-trees, to all manner of delusion, extravagance, and absurdity.

This is a delicate, soft-stepping, silken-slippered age, patronizing the finer feelings and a high-flown emotional virtue; vice has cast away its coarse and tattered garment, and, though finding no great difficulty in obtaining admittance into good society, must come with sleek visage, in a spruce, modern suit, glittering with what seems real gold; the religion that languishes in luxurious aspirings or dreams is very widely approved of. But does not an elevated and insidious but fatal pride tend to pervade the moral atmosphere of the time? We will glow in lofty ardour over the page of Fichte, Carlyle, Schiller, or Goethe, but it is a balmy and consoling air which breathes its mild adulation through our souls; for is it not our own nobleness which is so gratefully evoked? We will worship in the Temple of the Universe, with a certain proud homage, like that of the stars, and winds, and oceans; but our lordly knees must not be soiled by getting down into the dust. We will perform with Goethe the great moral act of self-renunciation, and wrap ourselves, with much ado, in those three reverences which he defines: but it were strangely bigoted to weep like an old Puritan because we cannot leap from sin our "shadow." Christianity, we are fain to proclaim, is pervading the age more deeply than ever before; not now as a constraining and antiquated form, but as an essence and life; not, indeed, with remarkable definiteness, not troubling itself to answer such minor questions as whether Christ's history is an actual fact, or whether Paul was an inspired preacher or a moral genius troubled with whims, but with a grand expansiveness and philosophic tolerance, sweet to remark ; casting a respectful and even deferring glance towards its plebeian ancestry in Judea, in whose steps, however, an enlightened descendant cannot exactly walk. This will never do. As of old, it remains true that Christianity alone preaches humility, and that this preaching is ever the special offence of the Cross : rather tread the burning marl in pride than receive mercy only from God. But, for the fallen finite being, this is the true position towards the Infinite ; from this Christianity cannot swerve. To proceed to our second point.

There is a pain which arises from inability to recognise the facts of divine justice, and from human sympathy with that part of mankind which rejects the Christian salvation and meets the doom foretold. It is a sorrow which never on earth departs entirely from noble minds, and is, perhaps, not intended to depart : that sympathetic agony which, in virtue of our human unity, we feel with every brother sufferer, whatever his sin, is doubtless designed to be one of our most mighty incentives to spread the gospel and to urge its acceptance. But, if Christianity does not altogether remove this pain, it does more to that end than any other system ; if there are clouds in the heavens which not even the telescope of faith can yet resolve into worlds of light, it can open a prospect infinitely more glorious and consoling than presents itself to the unaided eye. If one might conceive any sentence as written over the throne of God, kindling the eyes of the cherubim, it would be this : " God is Love." Christianity came, as it were, with the intimation that such words are there inscribed by the hand of Eternal Truth ; faith, gazing from the far station of earth, might be unable to decipher the separate letters, and might see them only as blended into one star-beam, falling through time's night, but even in that beam there was infinite consolation and infinite hope.

What does philosophy say of the future of the race? Either it dismisses, as the vagary of superstition, all idea of the possibility of the future visiting of sin by retribution, and thus leaves unstilled man's instinctive and indestructible apprehensions, and unaccounted for a dumb yet adamant array of facts, or it refers vaguely to benevolence, or it leaves good and evil in eternal strife. Christianity obviates the awful peril of sin being explained away or tampered with by attaching to it an infinite punishment. But it gives us the infallible assurance that our sense of justice will be satisfied; and in its unqualified declaration that God is Love, in its distinct intimation that judgment will be pronounced and stripes meted out with reference to the amount of light enjoyed, and in the variety of the figurative language in which it indicates the mode of punishment, it so far at least postpones the difficulty, referring it to eternity and to God. It bestows the sublime privilege of waiting upon the Most High; it permits the weak and wildered creature of finitude to watch the unfolding of the schemes of almighty Wisdom under the eye of almighty Love; and it is not presumptuous to think that one great fountain of that felicity, on which, as on an ocean stream, the souls of the blessed will eternally float, will burst forth in the sudden discovery of the might of that love, and the depth of that wisdom, in the disposal of every fate. When God wipes away all tears from the eyes of His own, He will wipe away also those noblest, and perhaps hottest tears that are shed on earth,—tears over the lost.

The Christian theory of work can be expressed in a few words, yet its full exposition and illustration were one of the most sublime pages in sacred poetry. "Faith that worketh by love;" it is all here. The basis is faith; it must lie at the root of all action: whatever truth this age may have forgotten, there is one truth which has been uttered for it in strains of eloquence so earnest and overpowering, that it bids fair to be for some time remembered ; that a man or nation is mighty in work precisely as he or it believes. Give a people faith, and, though its tribes lie scattered and powerless over its desert domain, like the dismembered limbs of a giant, it will gather itself together, and arise and stride forth along the shaking earth till every nation trembles at the name of Islam ; give a man faith, and, though his heart be narrow and his brain confined, and what he believes an absurdity and dream, he will pass by hundreds of abler men who occasionally doubt, and, trampling them in their gore, will control a fiery nation, and reign in terror, till the name of Robespierre is a trembling and abhorrence over the whole earth. But if all belief is powerful in action, if even belief in an idea makes a man resistless, of what nature will that work be whose hidden root only is faith, but all whose bloom and outgoing is love ? And thus it is in Christianity. It is not necessary to enter at all upon discussion of the nature of saving faith ; but this is, at least and beyond doubt, implied in it, that the believer is certain that God loves him, that in Christ He is his reconciled Father. For one moment ponder this thought. The man has faith that God loves him ; with all the emphasis of that strongest of human words, he lays it to his heart that love is in the bosom of the Eternal for him. What will be the instant result, by all we know even of fallen man ? It is perhaps not possible for a human heart altogether to resist the attraction even of human love ; the blind and selfish affection of passion which impiously arrogates the name may be scorned and hated ; but deep, unselfish, spiritual love cannot surely be known to exist towards us in any bosom without awakening some responsive thrill. And if it is possible between man and man, it is assuredly impossible between man and God. It is not given to the human being to resist the attraction of infinite tenderness, when once faith has seen the eye of God

looking down upon His accepted child ; after long waiting, when at last the balmy drops descend, the fountains must spring. And what is the relief, the joy, the blessedness, of him that loves ? Is it not the pouring forth of this love, the urging of it into every channel where it is possible for it to flow ? Yes : and this is the Christian scheme of work ; that he, whose breast swells with the irrepressible love of God, finds duty transmuted actually into its own reward, and every labour but fuel to enable the flame of his joy to go up towards heaven. The psychological verity of this whole scheme is perfect. Why is it that, when the heart of the youth or maiden has once been filled with love, when its whole compass has been occupied, as with molten gold, by affection for some beloved fellow-creature, if this beloved proves false or dies, it is no uncommon circumstance that madness or death ensue ? Is it not because the outgoing of love is prevented, and that, instead of issuing forth to wrap its object, instead of welling out in streams of joy, in offices of affection to that object, it must struggle in its fountain, and burn the heart that harbours it ? And may we not, in the face of Stephen, radiant in death, in the triumph-song of Paul when about to be offered, in the ecstatic hymns on the lips of the early martyrs as they went to the stake, find reliable evidence that there may be a love in the human breast for a Father God, which will seek, as in an agony, for some channel in which to flow forth ? Nor can it ever have to seek in vain : in the inner kingdom of the soul, in the outer kingdom of the world, there is ever work to be done for God, by which the Christian may prove that he loves his Saviour.

Of this last duty and joy, as permitted to the Christian, a single word may be said in passing. Even at this day you may find it declared that Calvinism circumscribes the freedom and fulness of the offer of redemption. Singular ! If you gather all the human race into one congregation, be I the most rigid of intelligent Calvinists, I will put to my lips the trumpet of the gospel, and proclaim that whosoever will may come and drink of the water of life freely. If you bring me to a hoary sinner, who has defied God for a lifetime, and who now shakes with the palsy of death, I will tell him that God yet waits to be gracious, and willeth not his death. And will my pleading with this dying transgressor be the less earnest and hopeful because I have not to trust to the feeble efficacy of my words, or the grasp of his expiring faculties, but may look and pray for the extension of a Divine arm to seize and rescue his soul? Because God has not taken me into His confidence, has not unfolded to me the Book of Life, and showed me the names of those chosen before the foundation of the world, will I not deign to be His instrument to save whom He pleases? You fix the lightning-rod on the mast; you cannot explain and represent the power in it to call down the fire of heaven. Calvinism makes it a duty to proclaim the gospel freely: at any one moment, there is no person in the world to whom it is not empowered to say, Come: but, in accordance with the whole analogy of nature, it covers up in mystery God's creative work.

With reference to the felicity of heaven, which was the next point to be remarked upon, the essential matters to be considered are the purity of its nature, independently of place and time, and the graduation of its degree before and after death. Butler defines happiness to consist in "a faculty's having its proper object." "Pleasure," says Sir William Hamilton, "is the reflex of unimpeded energy." The two expressions do not contradict each other, though that of Butler is the more exact and lucid. By application, however, of both, we might classify every degree and order of happiness from the highest to the lowest; it always remaining true that, however base or diluted might be the joy of activity, and though, relatively, even painful, it might yet be named pleasure in contrast with the state of compulsory inactivity. The pleasure of revenge is poor and contemptible, yet it is a joy compared with its unsatisfied gnawing. And whatever might be the lowest and feeblest form of joy, it cannot admit of question what would be the highest. It would assuredly be the activity of love. We have no sooner uttered the word, than we are at the gate of the Christian heaven. When the heart begins to go out in love to God, heaven has commenced within it, and the certitude of an eternal heaven is found in this, that it is towards an Infinite and Eternal God that it goes out. Provision is thus made at once for endless activity and endless love, to combine in a harmony of everlasting joy. There has been much written in our day about the worship of sorrow, and a great truth lies under the words ; this truth, freed of its encumbering falsehood, Christianity embraces ; it speaks of tribulation as that through which we enter into the kingdom of heaven, and gives sorrow the high office of breaking the soul to humility and contriteness, that it may kneel at the feet of Jesus. But, if there is any one instinctive utterance of the human soul, such is the declaration that sorrow, whatever it may subserve, is a blot upon God's universe, is the fang of the snake sin, is the shadow cast by the wings of the great dragon that has come up from the bottomless pit to prey on man ; and that, if well interpreted, the worship of joy is higher than the worship of sorrow. And how completely is all that insinuation about Christianity being allied to a selfish theory of morals now seen to vanish ! Happiness in the Christian scheme is not a motive, but an effect. The Christian does not serve God for happiness, but God by a sublime necessity has attached happiness to His service. Along the ranks of His army goes the command to rejoice ; above it floats the banner of love. Felicity is the light which rests over it all. From the helmets of the seraphim that light is flashed back in full unclouded blaze ; on us of the human race, who, as Isaac Taylor says beautifully, "seem to stand almost on the extreme confines of happiness," its first rays are even now descending. Happiness is the spherulic music in which a God, whose name is Love, has ordained that holiness must voice itself; His light, as it sweeps over the Æolian harp of immensity, kindling every dead world into beauty, awakens the Memnonian anthem of joy.

So much for the nature of the felicity which Christianity styles celestial. Have we then no distinctive character to assign to that state and that locality which the believer enters upon after death, and which, in common discourse, receive the special name of heaven? We have. In the essential character of the happiness of the future heaven, we can point to no change, but in circumstances there is a mighty alteration. Fichte, importunately insisting that a party, which may be taken as that of evangelical Christianity, expects a sensuous heaven, points in triumph to the fact that the eye is by it turned to futurity, when there can be but an objective change; while all that is subjective in heaven's bliss must be enjoyed now or never. Without any straining, it can be shown that precisely the reverse of Fichte's proposition is true, and that, unless the Christian believes in, and hopes for, heaven, he cannot be sure that he has a real capacity for spiritual enjoyment. For what is this objective change on which Fichte bases his argument? It is the removal of every source of enjoyment peculiar to sense and time, the casting free of the immortal soul from every kind of happiness which is not in goodness and in God. The Christian professes to find joy in God as his portion. The Christian ethics of Butler are based on the idea of simple goodness as the object of an affection. In heaven alone can we be sure that God only will be our portion,—that goodness pure and simple must fill the heart with joy, or leave it void. No man can enjoy the Christian heaven whose conception of its joy is sensual or selfish. The Paleyan moralist, kept in the path of outward rectitude by Hope going before him with a picture of Milton's heaven, and Fear coming after him with a picture of Dante's hell, has no idea of it. Nor can Fichte offer any sure test by which it may be known that the bliss which he expressly and emphatically associates with goodness arises from delight in goodness alone. The joy of the Christian heaven depends upon its holiness. Those who desire to form some conception of the peculiar glory of the celestial ages ought to read Butler's sublime sermon on the Love of God, and to follow out its suggestive meaning. Butler there aims at indicating the exhaustless sources of joy which would be found in the contemplation of the divine nature. We can here offer only one or two themes of meditation, supplementary to this central consideration. Let it then be thought what a power there is towards the impeding and shadowing of happiness in the very fact that this is a world of prevailing sin. We fight here under the cloud : we can have little hope that we will hear the final shout of victory. And as we go to each charge, do we not see around us the fallen and the dying ? Are we not aware that over the whole earth there is always sorrow, and have we not to dim the eye of imagination, and close the gates of sympathy, that we cry not out at the spectacles of grief which are ever, in woful pageantry, passing onwards to the grave ? How true is this of Mrs Browning's !

“ The fool hath said there is no God,
But none, there is no sorrow.”

Every human heart must thrill to that touch of beautiful pathos, in which the author of Festus bodies forth the depth and earnestness of human wo. Among the celestial bands an angel is seen in tears ; a word of amazement passes along at the sight of an angel weeping ; but the wonder is soon explained :

“ It is the angel of the earth ;
She is always weeping.”

While our step is on such a world as earth, we must know the thrills of sympathetic anguish. Surely it will be an unmeasured access of joy when the cloud of sin, smitten by the light of eternity, finally rolls away, and bares the sunless heavens. Consider, again, the joy that may arise in the heavenly ages from the contemplation of the works of God. Even here it cannot be questioned that serene and exquisite enjoyment is obtained by pure and elevated minds in gazing on the greatness and beauty of nature. But the mind now may be compared to a mountain lake, in which, indeed, at times, the silent and beautiful hills, and the calm flowers, and forest foliage, and the clouds touched by the finger of morn or eve, may glass themselves, but which is ever and anon ruffled and obscured by the rude tempest. And who can tell how far this enjoyment may be enhanced, when the sympathies are all true and harmonious, and vibrating to the music of love ? What mortal man can guess the rapture which fills the eyes of the seraphim as they sweep onward among the stars of God ! Lastly, not to multiply instances, can we not even now perceive, that from Christian friendship, as it would exist in heaven, there would result an exhaustless and unutterable joy ? One grand complaint that noble minds have against society is, that its vast texture of forms and gradations prevents kindred hearts from uniting,—thwarts the action of sympathy. Assuredly the highest terrestrial joy is that of perfect friendship ; and how rare, how nearly impossible, is perfect friendship here !

For one another, though dissimilar ?”

Yet the harmony that can result from this union in diversity is scarce to be seen on earth. It is no vague imagination, but what can be clearly deduced from Scripture and reason, and easily embraced in thought, that from the friendship of the redeemed, knit in perfect sympathy of Divine love, will spring a joy which the harps of heaven will scarce have chords to voice.

Such considerations as these might be multiplied indefinitely, and that with strict adherence to truth. The prospect they open up to us is sublime indeed. And if its glory admitted of enhancement, would it not arise from casting a look back upon the stricken and lowly penitent, as he lay in Christian humility, expecting all from the hand of God? Here it is as in the case of physical science; which, beginning with bare algebraic formula, climbs upwards from system to system, till it is encompassed with the blaze of an inconceivable glory, and the wing of human imagination is seen feebly fluttering far below.

Fichte, in his Way to the Blessed Life, after confessing that neither himself nor any other philosopher had till that time succeeded in elevating, by popular instruction, those who "either will not or cannot study philosophy systematically, to the comprehension of its fundamental truths," allows that "Christ's Apostles," and a succession of "very unlearned persons," have possessed this essential knowledge. He discriminates well the scientific and developed knowledge of philosophy from the life-knowledge of its fundamental truths. But might it not have occurred to him, that perhaps this strange exception might have another meaning and cause than any of which he dreamed? Might he not have conceived it possible that the gospel of Jesus had actually some wondrous power of getting at the life? If he missed the truth, let us hold by it. There is a profound meaning in the following sentences of Neander, used in reference to primitive Christianity:—"It belonged, indeed, to the essence of Christianity, that while it could become all things to all men, and adapt itself to the most different and opposite circumstances of human nature, it could condescend even to wholly sensuous modes of comprehending divine things, in order, by the power of a divine life, working from within, gradually to spiritualize them.

. . . . In this respect, the great saying of the Apostle may often have found its application, that the divine treasure was received, and for a season preserved, in earthen vessels, that the abundant power might be of God, and not of man." Let this be well pondered, and that superiority in Christianity which Fichte acknowledges may be explained. Coleridge spake truly when he said that philosophy was in the pagan night as the fire-fly of the tropics, making itself visible, but not irradiating the darkness.

THE SOCIAL LIFE.

RELIGION is the only stable basis on which a commonwealth can be reared. This proposition, fundamental to all that is here to be said of the social life, might be demonstrated by clear inductive reasoning : I shall attempt merely to trace in outline one or two of the main divisions of the proof.

The first, and perhaps, all things considered, the most important argument in its support, is to be derived from the analogy of the individual. The community has, so to speak, a distinct personality ; it is not a mere collection of individuals. The more careful and protracted our observation of the man and the nation is, and the more profound our reflection upon the phenomena presented by each, the more firm will our assurance become that a strict analogy holds between them. Butler's demonstration of the supremacy of conscience in the individual bosom is an adequate proof that the healthful and natural state of the nation is exhibited, only when the national conscience is dominant, when religion prevails. The political Butler has not yet appeared ; but a noble task awaits him. He will show how, as the man who listens to the voice of conscience, who can stand apart from his fellows, and, over all the brawling of the popular wind, hear the still small voice of conscience as supreme on earth, and turn his eye at its monition towards heaven for an approval which will make him independent of human opinion, is he who is most true to his nature ; so the nation which would rightly occupy its position in the world must have aims above all that is sublunary, and hold itself as a nation responsible to God.

The second source of argument on this point is the evidence of history. More express and conclusive evidence than is derivable from this source can scarcely be conceived. Of many things the historical student may be doubtful, but of this at least he must be sure : That no amount of wealth, no extent of culture, has ever given a nation strength and stability when the religious element has been in decay. Let it be noted that I now speak of the development and power of the religious faculty ; not of the subordinate, though important question, whether the religion is true or false. And let any man consider the history of Judea, of Greece, of Rome, of Italy, and of France, and declare whether the nation is capable of avoiding some one fatal peril or another which is not religious. Either foreign subjugation, or domestic despotism, or maniac anarchy, has ever overtaken the godless nation ; and, in all times, the nation that had a faith, that revered an oath, has put a bridle in the teeth of the unbelieving peoples.

The only other department of proof to which it is necessary to refer is that of the testimony of great individual thinkers. It is interesting to note how, one might say without exception, the great thinkers and workers of all time have here agreed. Consider the amount and the nature of the evidence to be derived from that one source, the construction of ancient and modern polities. Every legislator requires religion as his bower-anchor ; every man who attempts to establish a commonwealth, or to rule an empire, commences with religion. That he was himself an irreligious man or sceptic mattered little. Whether he were a Zoroaster or Mahomet, a Ptolemy Lagus or Napoleon, it was the same ; the point of the national pyramid, each felt, must point to heaven. And the testimony of thinkers is equally explicit. Plato virtually makes religion the base of his republic ; and Mr Carlyle is, in our own day, again proclaiming, in what manner, or with what likelihood of success, it is unnecessary to inquire, the same truth. In one of Bacon's Essays, you find his authority and that of Cicero, like one sword with two edges, knit together. The fact is explicitly stated by Montesquieu. One of the most healthy thinkers of recent times, Thomas Chalmers, gave the strength of his life to enunciate and enforce the momentous doctrine.

It is not impossible, with the light of revelation and the voice of history, to discern the grand outline of that method by which God has ordained and commanded man, in slow progress through the centuries, to work out his perfection as a race. On the one hand, he has a personal freedom from God, which it is his duty to preserve, which he dare not alienate ; on the other, in order to his progress, God has revealed to him, first, by the fact of an experienced necessity, and, second, by the direct sanction of His word, that civil government, the more or less complete merging of individual freedom in public law, is also a divine ordinance. In the former of these it is involved, that every faculty which God has bestowed upon or committed to the individual perform its full and appropriate work, or reach its perfect and congenial development ; that the intellectual powers have a fair sphere for their operation, that the conscience be untrammelled, that the will exercise its legitimate authority over thought and action, and that each capacity of enjoyment be duly gratified. All this is implied in the perfection of individual freedom ; and all this Christianity guarantees in its declaration of the essential equality, the blood-unity, of all men, and its command that all work be done, that every faculty operate, with might. In the latter,—in the ordinance of civil government,—it is implied that every man perform not only his own primary and direct duty, but that he subserve the performance of all other duty ; that he play, so to speak, into the hand of every other man ; that he make way where he is himself superfluous ; that he obey where his service is necessary to the performance of a duty which he is himself incompetent to effect ; in one word, that he recognise as right all that graduation of rank according to work done, which nature tends to effect. This is the true theory of divine right,—that the real, the natural power, be obeyed. Let it not be imagined that this is a divine sanction of any particular form, or any particular depositary, of governing power : Christianity does not change a living body into a mummy or petrification, and command men to obey it : it sanctions the power ; and if the time has come for this power to be born, the giant child may hear its sanctioning voice in the womb of futurity, and tear its way, amid what throes soever, to life and inheritance. In the darkest and most barbarous times this social theory of Christianity will be a guiding light ; when civilization shall be completed, when freedom and law shall have become one, and not till then, it shall have been wrought out.

It will be proper to consider certain social aspects of the present day with some degree of minuteness, and this may be done with perspicuity and convenience in a couple of separate chapters.

CHAPTER I.

THE SOCIAL PROBLEM OF THE AGE.

THAT there is in our time some great difference from other ages, that some Æonian change is in progress, seems hidden from no thinker of the day. De Tocqueville on the one hand, and Carlyle on the other, proclaim the fact. This process of change was inaugurated by the greatest event of modern times, in itself, indeed, but a result, the first French Revolution. The doctrines of the Encyclopædia, the infidel or atheistic theories of Voltaire, Diderot, Naigeon, and their followers, had gradually pervaded French and European society, eating out religion from the heart of nations. Kings and nobles trembled not. This new philosophy of materialism and sensuality seemed to them but a summer cloud, touched with the roseate hues of genius, and distilling a gentle rain, to nourish the flowers of sentiment and foster the growths of science; if there did issue from it a few gleams of distant lightning, these would but clear the air of ennui, and promote a freer respiration. The ancient sentence, "Fear God and honour the king," had, it was agreed, held sway long enough over the human mind; the principalities and powers of earth were satisfied, and sat smiling in the secure content of dotard imbecility, while the Encyclopædic lightning burned out from its place among the beliefs and maxims of men, the former half of the regulating sentence : Let there be no God, they said, but oh, continue to honour us. At last the storm came, in a burst that shook the globe. The world stood still to listen ; even the lone and discrowned Jerusalem, sitting amid her graves, became more desolate, for pilgrims forgot to turn their steps to the East. We know the result. We have marked the path of that lightning which burned the old French monarchy from the face of the earth, and in whose blasting gleam the brilliance of every crown in the world waxed pale. That wild glare awoke a power that had long slumbered :—The people. Leaving Encyclopædism behind, and lifting its voice in other nations besides France, this great new element in social affairs—in its awakening, its attempt to make itself heard, its slow gravitation towards its own place in the system of things—has given its distinctive features to our epoch.

To deny the fact that the relations of classes and the modes of social action wear at present among free nations an aspect unknown in the feudal ages, is now impossible. It is simply out of the power of any man to turn the eye of his imagination upon the mediæval time—to note the tranquillity of its general atmosphere, breathing in dim religious light through the still cathedral aisle, and resting round the hoary turret of the feudal castle—to mark how reverently the serf looks up to his master, and with what undoubting devotion the worshipper kneels before the uplifted crucifix—to observe the Book unchained from its place at the altar, and the venerating wonder with which men gaze upon him who can read—to see one large class sitting aloft, glittering in its badges, in its one hand feudal charters, in its other a feudal sword, on its lip a really noble and beautiful smile of chivalrous valour and youthful strength, on its brow all the intelligence of the age, and another large class below, born to bow down before this, to receive food from its hands and instruction from its lips, and yield it, in return, the instinctive affection of children and the childlike obedience of men not born to the heritage of a will—and then to maintain that the order of society has not undergone a universal and upturning alteration. So thorough, so transforming, is the change from this era, that a single glance at the picture is sufficient to convince any intelligent, informed, and healthy-minded man that it is gone for ever. It is only in what may be called late years that the ultimate influences of the mighty agency introduced by John Faust into civilization—the agency of the printing press—have begun to be traceable. It is only in these times that its unpredicted power to loosen the tongue of the world, to draw forth the electricity of thought, to turn the pen into a sceptre, and the hereditary diadem into a toy, has been fairly evinced. It is the grand characteristic of our age that thought is more fluent, that men more easily communicate together, than heretofore; the University of the modern era can be closed to none; for who is it that cannot learn to read and write, and who that can read, and has the power of using his fingers, may not act upon his fellows? We see around us the rending of ancient associations, the awakening of novel powers; we witness discordance, severance, doubt; the ancient reverences and the ancient unities have mostly passed away; men believe not, without uttering a determined Why; men respect not, without a mandate in nature's own handwriting.

“Thought,” says Goethe, in his sententious manner, “widens, but lames; action narrows, but animates.” The words furnish a key to the intelligence of all the phenomena we have been contemplating, and a warrant for believing that they may exhibit, not the spasms of approaching dissolution, but the untamed energy of new developments of life.

It is well known how the man of one idea can work ; it is well known also, that in order to do any single work well, you must on it concentrate your efforts. The same law applies to the nation. The army of Islam was victorious because it poured the lightning of its defiance on the foe as from one blazing eye. Nations rolled away resistless to the crusade, because their hearts throbbed with the one idea of saving the sepulchre of the Saviour from the desecration of unbelievers. If you look well into the ancient time, you will find the unity of action on the part of vassals accounted for by the consideration that they had not a sufficient power of thought to doubt ; the iron energy of governments, by the fact that there had not yet dawned on the world the idea of toleration, and that they were lamed by no freedom or variety of opinion. There are, however, in the individual life, stages which are peculiarly those of doubt. The youth acts cheerfully and with energy on the belief he has received from his fathers : then he begins to question, to hesitate, to doubt ; his arm is at once paralyzed, and with many words his actions become few and indecisive. But he may advance to yet a higher state : this doubt and temporary indecision may be a stage in his progress to calm intelligent manhood ; he may regain his early cheerful and united energy, with his beliefs his own, and the still sky of manhood over him. There are similar periods in the life of nations, and that "transition era" in which we live is one of them. The old relations which bound class to class have passed away, and with them we have lost much of the old power of action ; pretension and quackery flourish amain. Mr Carlyle tells us that all things have unfixed themselves, and float distractedly on an ocean of talk. It is useless and it is contrary to truth to say that his denunciations are altogether uncalled for, that the peril he describes is not real. Let any one look into the state of our law, and the slow success of efforts making for its amendment ; let him examine the condition of our trusts, enough, as on good authority appears, of itself to give work, long and difficult, to Reform, had it the hands of Briareus ; let him consider the ease with which public nuisance can shelter itself under so-called private right, and the clumsy and inefficient machinery by which any change, demanded it may be by the very health of our towns, can be effected ; let him reflect on the power of corporations to clog the wheels of general progress, and the seeming powerlessness of Britain to teach her children ; then, or rather when he has added from all hands to this partial list of our shortcomings, let him decide whether an infusion of energy into the legislative and administrative agencies of our country is not urgently demanded. Nay, if this does not satisfy him, let him traverse the Continent of Europe, and see despotism teaching her children, cleaning, and beautifying, and ordering her streets, offering countless suggestions of order, cheapness, decorum, common sense, to a British observer, and then let him answer.

“When,” exclaims Mr Carlyle, “shall we have done with all this of British liberty, voluntary principle, dangers of centralization, and the like ? It is really getting too bad. For British liberty, it seems, the people cannot be taught to read. British liberty, shuddering to interfere with the rights of capital, takes six or eight millions of money annually to feed the idle labourer whom it dare not employ. For British liberty we live over poisonous cess-pools, gully-drains, and detestable abominations ; and omnipotent London cannot sweep the dirt out of itself. British liberty produces,—what ? Floods of Hansard debates every year, and apparently little else at present. If these are the results of British liberty, I, for one, move we should lay it on the shelf a little, and look out for something other and farther. We have achieved British liberty hundreds of years ago ; and are fast growing, on the strength of it, one of the most absurd populations the sun, among his great Museum of Absurdities, looks down upon at present."

Certain of these expressions may be exaggerated, and the conclusion arrived at will assuredly not be accepted here. But the strictures of Mr Carlyle suggest a question which the considerations already adduced, the spectacle, so often repeated within the last fifteen years on the Continent, of powerless constitutionalism falling back into despotism, and many characteristics besides those already referred to of the domestic administration in Britain and America, make exceedingly urgent. It is this :—Can we combine modern freedom, thought, and enlightenment, with the strength and activity of despotism? Can that awakened power, the People, be kept awake, nay roused, by an ever-broadening enlightenment, to a plenitude and potency of political function even yet unexampled, while every benefit and every energy of government are preserved?

Omitting the consideration of certain views of less importance, it is necessary to notice two solutions of our problem, proposed, either explicitly or implicitly, by classes of thinkers who recognise the necessity of reaching a solution. With each party we shall have one important point of agreement: from each it may be necessary to differ in matters of vital moment.

The first solution is that which, however modified, had its source in the materialist philosophy of the first French Revolution, and has ever continued in essential particulars to agree with it; that of liberal, or, more strictly, infidel radicalism. The one thing worthy to be accepted from the French Revolution, and from the party whose view we now consider, is their testimony to human freedom. It was an apple of celestial hue and fragrance which France stretched out her hand to pluck; and if she found it but bitter and bloody dust, it proved such only because the hand with which she grasped it was that of a blaspheming demon. The sun looked down on strange sights in that Revolution tumult ; on sights whose significance can never be exhausted, and in which the eyes of nations will in all time have deep lessons to read. It looked down on a people that turned its gaze on the past, and saw generation after generation trooping dimly down the vista of years from the cavern of vacant Chance ; which had the heart to cast its eye on the future, and see all men sinking from the verge of the world into the blank abyss of annihilation ; and which, even in the ghastly loneliness of such a universe as this, standing for one cheerless moment between two vast and eternal graves, could contrive to be riotous and gay. It looked down on a cathedral where men were grimacing in idiot laughter round what they called the goddess of reason. It looked down on a Convention where they were "decreeing" the existence of the Supreme Being ; the existence of Him to whom the whole universe is as a film of breath on the morning air. Perhaps more wonderful still, it looked down upon a nation having, with all this, the name of freedom on its lips, uttering words which sounded like those of heroic patriots and poets, asserting the equality of man, and declaring that it would rule itself. But it had been most wonderful of all if it had seen these words made good, if a people denying its immortality, and believing the universe to have no moral Sun, knit by no sacred memories to the past, and owning no treasure of hope in the future, its spirit stubborned by none of the iron of duty, and its appetites calling aloud for pleasure, had been able to become free. This it did not behold. That nation first mocked freedom by the mummeries of children, and then made its name a loathing over the world by the horror of bloody cruelty. Federation fêtes, statues of liberty, endless outflowing of meaningless mellifluous oratory, and then foaming hatred, and the long line of death-tumbrils ; the dream that freedom was no government, and the awakening to find that it was the government of madness ;—such was the history of the French Revolution. If we accept even from it the imperishable truth that freedom is the inalienable inheritance and ultimate goal of man, let us also read in it this other lesson, that without religion a nation can never be free, but will either go mumming and fooling to plant liberty trees and inaugurate plaster-of-Paris images, or will awaken the Furies of anarchy, and join with them in a dance of death. Never did revolution more completely fail than that of France ; and never in this world was there a revolution so profoundly infidel. Its source was the infidelity of Voltaire ; the philosophers who supported it were as a body infidel. Other and inferior gifts God may grant to nations that have utterly forgotten Him, but it would seem that the crowning gift of freedom can be conferred only upon one in whose heart there is the belief in a God, and which can reverence an oath. For this reason, we shall turn away from infidel radicalism ; it aims at an impossibility, it contradicts human history.

From atheistic liberalism, which must end either in folly or in anarchy, let us turn to Mr Carlyle.

The fundamental axiom of that diluted pantheism of which we recognised Mr Carlyle as the great living advocate, we found to be, that man is divine. The whole tendency of such a belief would necessarily be towards the exaltation of the great man : if such a thing as worship could exist, it would be worship of him : if a theory of government were to be propounded, it would be that in which his wisdom ruled without let, and his will was absolute. If my fellow is more divine than I, it is right that I bow down to him, it is right that I serve him ; and it is no difficult task to show that the good things of this life will plenteously reward my doing so. In one word, if well traced out, the legitimate social theory of pantheism is despotism.

Although we find in Mr Carlyle's latest writings what seems to expose him to the objection of looking somewhat too fixedly on the past ; and although our own time and land might have furnished him with scenes and with men as well fitted to enforce dramatically certain of those lessons which he has read us in his Past and Present, as St Edmundsbury and Abbot Samson ; yet it is but a superficial view of his whole works which does not perceive a deeper truth behind all his applause of the past. His mighty intellect and iron will are drawn, as by the sympathy of brotherhood, towards the giant forces of the olden time ; he speaks of the present age as feeble and distracted, when contrasted with ages long gone by ; and, in the work just named, he has, by the wizard power of his genius, summoned up, in living distinctness, certain great spectacles and men of the past, that those of the present may hide their heads before them. Yet who has proclaimed with such emphasis as he, that the law of all human things is progress, that it is vain to attempt to chain the future under the past ? We cannot fairly doubt that his desire or hope is, not that the nineteenth or twentieth century should become the thirteenth, but only that certain fundamental characteristics should be found in both.

Mr Carlyle, looking forward into the distance, appears to contemplate a time characterized somewhat as follows : the rubbish of extinct customs has been swept aside ; the dust of shattered systems has fallen from the air, and sunk harmless into the soil ; the discords of quackery and disputation have gone silent ; and, alas ! the world-tree of the nations, planted of old in Judea, the Igdrasil of modern civilization, that bloomed into its chivalries, and yielded fair flowerage of literatures and philosophies, and bore its final fruit in the Lutheran Reformation, has fallen utterly, and mouldered as into moorland moss ; the deep eternal skies of nature, the great laws of duty, of industry, and of hero-worship, have again emerged, and roofed the world. More and more the development of Mr Carlyle's system has tended to the pouring of contempt upon all the modes and agencies of our present social life ; he has scowled upon popular assemblies, upon free election, upon what is partly the voice and partly the guide of public opinion, the free press : more and more clearly his all-embracing word,—of command, of denunciation, of prophecy,—has been hero-worship ; and, with more and more distinctness and decision, he has pointed at the severance of all men into two great classes, the foolish and the wise, the silently and blindly governed, and the silently and irresponsibly governing. He has declared his utter abandonment of faith in any political exercise of the popular understanding, by proposing a step of manifest return, in the appointment of certain senators or privy-councillors by nomination.* One of his late works contains an assertion which, with absolute explicitness, declares him the eternal foe of freedom, which prescribes to it, in conferring or debating with him, but one tone, and that the tone which can so well be borrowed from his own works, of implacable defiance and irreconcilability ; an assertion which is probably the keenest and most bitter insult ever sent to the rude heart of the human race, ever levelled against that great class which has made up, and which for an indefinite number of centuries must continue to make up, the bulk of mankind, and, if not a preponderating, at least a large proportion of the public voice of every free country ; the sad and amazing declaration, that “by any ballot-box Judas will go as far as Jesus.”† He has sneered at

* In the Latter Day Pamphlets.

† A similar statement, based, not as Mr Carlyle bases it, on general considerations, but on the facts of the gospel history, is constantly to be found in commonplace books. To-day, it is said, the Jewish multitude cried Hosannah before the steps of Christ ; to-morrow, their shout was, Crucify Him, Crucify Him. A vague glance at the Scripture narrative appears to sanction this representation ; but such a glance is precisely the advantages of liberty, and palliated the evils of despotism, pointing to Epictetus and to Paul as showing the independence of the individual character of any such influence. In a word, no one can question the fact, that Mr Carlyle has drawn off altogether from the side of what is meant by radicalism ; that his political philosophy has disjoined itself from the popular enlightenment, the popular science, the popular election, which cluster round that standard. What, then, does he propose, or prophetically proclaim ? What is signified by his unceasing laudation of "might," what by the analogies upon which he ventures, surely with a strange boldness, between men and the lower animals ? What is indicated by his admiration of Frederick the Great, the virtual what can yield nothing in the way of strict historical fact ; and careful inspection for a single moment, of the dates and circumstances of the events recorded, proves it to be the reverse of correct. The occasion of the passover had filled the Jewish capital to overflowing. The crowd which occupied its streets and poured into its surrounding valleys, when the approach of the Galilean Prophet was announced, represented with peculiar fulness and accuracy the universal commonalty, urban and rural, of Judea. To whatever expression of sentiment it gave utterance, that was the unmistakeable, spontaneous, and general sentiment of the Jewish people. The vast multitude received Christ as one coming in the name of the Lord. Such then was, and had been from first to last, the opinion, more or less intelligent, of the Hebrew commonalty touching Jesus of Nazareth. The great instincts of humanity in their bosoms said, This man speaks truth. How was it, then, that a crowd, and a Jewish crowd, called aloud, Crucify Him ? The reason is simple. At the hour when sacerdotal conspirators were plotting the arrest of Christ, the family of every Jewish peasant and artizan in that vast multitude which spread palm-trees before the Saviour was gathered in solemnity round the table on which lay the paschal supper. An outcast scum of vagabonds and assassins, such as can be had for hire in any large capital, and could be found in Jerusalem, was still abroad. A venal rabble, of the kind which has in every age belied the people, undertook the job of arresting Jesus. And why did they come by night ? Because by daylight the people of Judea would have trampled into the dust that brutish crew, as they attempted to seize Him whom the common people heard gladly. It is a melancholy proof of human carelessness and vague stupidity that to this day the common people should bear the blame of a proceeding which was managed as it was for fear of the body of the Jewish nation.

declaration of whose reign to his subjects was, All you can demand of me is, that I govern well; if you are happy, it is of no importance whether your happiness is that of freemen or slaves? The sum total and ultimate goal of Mr Carlyle's political thinking has turned out to be what was naturally and philosophically to be expected—Despotism. He will not attempt to marry freedom to strength, nor cherish the hope that the race may pass from the unintelligent energy of youth, when force followed authority, and thought had not lamed action, to the free energy of manhood; the multitude are hopelessly foolish, and their highest bliss must be found in bowing, with instinctive reverence, before an absolute sovereign, their eyes blinded by the glare of his sole and God-like will. All the inventions, all the sciences, all the enlightenment of modern times, may then be brought to clothe and feed them, as his ability renders possible, and as his bounty chooses to dispense; only they must obey with no question as to the reason.

Surely there is something sad and disappointing in this prospect opened up by Mr Carlyle for the future. Has all that ancient and heroic struggle for freedom, then, been but the fruit of delusion and frenzy? Or was our race destined to expend all its heroism in a long, weary battle; and when at last it saw its enemy dead, when at last it did behold Despotism in the swoon of death, with its cruel and bloodshot eyeball glazing and becoming lightless and ghastly, to find it had toiled and bled for a mere bauble, and that its only hope was to re-animate the conquered monster? Has the path of humanity, over sandy deserts and up flinty mountains, through burning heats and bitter storms, been to such a promised land as this? A promised land! No true man would accept it, though its vines were richer than those of Eschol, and it flowed with milk and honey. Decided was the error of the Radicals of the French Revolution; still more deadly is that of Mr Carlyle. There is a strength of nobleness in the human heart to scorn such prosperity as even perfect despotism could bestow ; for no humiliating happiness will it sell its birthright of freedom ; men will rather be freemen, ay, and die for freedom, in a rocky gorge of Hellas, or on bare moors in Scotland, than slaves amid the vines of Campania.

“ Nor happiness, nor majesty, nor fame,
Nor peace, nor strength, nor skill in arms or arts,
Shepherd those herds whom tyranny makes tame ;
Verse echoes not one beating of their hearts, —
History is but the shadow of their shame, —
Art veils her glass, or from the pageant starts,
As to oblivion their blind millions fleet,
Staining that heaven with obscene imagery

One grand temptation of the age is to distrust and abandon Freedom. Her robe has been soiled with blood, her eye has been lit with frenzy, “ blasphemy’s loud scream ” has mingled with her “ music of deliverance ; ” but she is, for all this, an angel of light, and we must not forego the faith and hope that her features will yet beam forth in their own immortal loveliness. We shall not lift the light from human annals, and silence the songs which have risen from earth’s fairest homes and noblest battle-fields ; that thrill which the word “ freedom ” has ever sent through the heart of nations has not been altogether meaningless. Upon any correct theory of man, the essential excellence of freedom is demonstrable ; not, certainly, as a present possession, but as a future attainment : it must be the aim of civilization to educe every faculty of the whole man, spiritual as well as physical ; and this can never be done until man, as a civis, as one united indissolubly with his fellows, thinks and wills, as well as works and feeds. At what period a nation may come to be capable of freedom, it were long to tell ; but the nation which has had freedom won for it by the wisdom and dauntlessness of its sons, covers itself with everlasting infamy if it cannot enter on the possession of its inheritance. To accept Mr Carlyle's view of the future, were to confess ourselves nationally worthy of this contempt; and if we put "British freedom on the shelf," our heroic fathers that have bled for us from Bannockburn to Sedgemoor, will, from their high thrones, look down upon us with indignation and shame.

There is another answer to our question besides those we have glanced at. But first it may be well to ask, whether the attainment of energetic and stable freedom is to be considered easy. Does human freedom mean the dissolution of government? Are the shouts of nations at the name and prospect of liberty to be understood as indicating that freedom is easy, that it consists in every man's doing as he likes; that, when a nation has hurled tyranny aside, it has now only to gesticulate round plaster figures, or go in white-robed procession to plant liberty-trees, or amuse itself with any other form of foolery? No. The sternest task ever attempted by a nation is that of inaugurating and maintaining freedom. The man who governs his own spirit has been, on the highest authority, pronounced greater than he who takes a city: this man has attained personal freedom. National freedom is simply the government of its own spirit by a nation. It is the attempt on the part of a people, as on the part of a man, to have a will chainless as that of the wildest libertine, and yet live and work with united energy under wisdom's law. And the toils of Thermopylæ, Morgarten, and Naseby, were, it may be, slight to this.

" Latius regnes avidum domando
Spiritus, quam si Libyam remotis
Gadibus jungas, et uterque Poenus Serviat uni."

There is no free people to which the lines may not be addressed. It was a sublime DUTY, rather than an alluring pleasure, whose distant gleam lit the eyes of nations as they looked to liberty! To attain true freedom demands the very last agony of national effort, the severe and final endeavour by which a people at length reaches its throne.

Christianity affords us the axioms in accordance with which the question proposed can be satisfactorily answered. Taking from irreligious radicalism the truth groped after by it, and accepting at the hands of Mr Carlyle the vitally important lessons he has so powerfully re-proclaimed,—avoiding anarchy on the one hand, and despotism on the other,—it sets the race on a path of unlimited advancement. Christianity pronounces men in essentials equal. All the protests which, in the course of human history, have been uttered against the oppression of the poor by the rich, and in behalf of the native majesty of man, sink into insignificance when compared with that uttered by and embodied in Christianity ; there is one grain of truth in that claim which modern democracy, though in crazed, and maundering, and blasphemous tones, has so often put forth, to number the founders of Christianity in its ranks. In express terms, the Christian revelation declares all nations of the earth to be of one blood ; it pronounces all men equally the subjects of one King ; it makes the value of a soul infinite, and shows no difference between the worth of that of a beggar and that of a prince. Look into the stable at Bethlehem, on that night when crowned sage and humble shepherd knelt by the cradle of that Babe who was their common King ; do you not see in that spectacle the bond of an essential equality, uniting all ranks, and making the regal purple and the peasant's russet faint and temporary distinctions ? Coleridge said well, that the fairest flower he ever saw climbing round a poor man's window was not so beautiful in his eyes as the Bible which he saw lying within ! If all classes forsook the gospel, one might expect the poor, the hard-toiling, the despised, to cling to it. Whatever Christianity may have become in our Churches and in our times, the great class of the workers can find in its aspects no excuse for abandoning itself, unless they can show that the Churches have re-written the Bible ; unless they can allege that it no longer exhibits the Divine Founder of Christianity preaching to the poor, companying with publicans and sinners, bringing into the bosoms of harlots the healing light of Divine love ; unless they can show that it was the sanctioned usage of apostolic times to honour the rich in the Christian assemblage ; unless, in one word, they can deny that the gospel holds forth to every man the prospect of being a king and priest to God.

But Christianity does not make this truth of essential human brotherhood powerless by leaving it alone. Mr Carlyle, with his glance of lightning, saw the anarchy or the weakness to which modern freedom was tending ; government he knew to be absolutely necessary. And this government, in some way or other, must be vested in able men. He called on the nations to obey their mightiest, to worship them as heroes ; and proceeded to scorn and scout the prevalent ideas and hopes of freedom. But Christianity meets this want too. It writes down civil government as an ordinance of God. Not that it sanctions what has been called divine right, or any such superficial and absurd notion : not that, in any part or passage of the sacred volume, it commands us to honour any one for the blood in his veins ; but that it recognises the institution of government as a necessity, and enjoins men loyally to submit to it, and honour the king. Any one form of government is not appointed ; but government is stamped with approval ; and, by the promulgation of the truth of radical equality, a way is opened up by which freedom may flourish under any political form. How, then, are we in every case to find our rulers ? By finding those who are fitted to rule. Is the fact that they are thus fitted the reason of our honouring them, and our theory, after all, the same as that of hero-worship ? By no means. Their honour is reflected. Their fitness is the indication of the reason why they should be honoured ; the reason itself is because God has commissioned them ; and we are precisely as free in performing the tasks naturally appointed us, as they in performing those for which He has fitted them. Thus, as it embraces the one truth of democracy, Christianity embraces every particle of truth which Mr Carlyle has contributed to human knowledge. All that he has said of the might and value of man, though perhaps demanding supplement and modification, can on these terms be accepted without endangering human freedom ; every power of the hero can be brought to serve the race, and yet honour be done both to God and to man. The greatest will rule because God has given them the kingdom ; and the people shall be willing in the day of His power. A nation would be perfectly free and perfectly governed if the allied truths of equality and subordination were both in full force ; if not only the ablest governed, but the channels to government were absolutely unobstructed, and every man had the assurance that, if he were the ablest, he would be governor.

Christianity does not furnish any nostrum by which all the ills of society can be at once cured, its weakness turned to strength, and its powers brought into operation ; the bare fact that any one, whencesoever he derive his specific, misconceives so far the nature of man and the evolution of history, as to imagine that the one is to be perfected, and the other brought to a close, by a magic word which he can utter, is conclusive evidence of his utter incapacity. Without Christianity no nation can be fundamentally and entirely regenerated ; unless we proceed upon its theory of man, we always fall into some fatal error ; spreading out into the stagnant marsh of weakness and disunion, tumbling in cataract-foam, writhing madly and streaked with blood, into the abyss of anarchy, or gliding into the Dead Sea of Despotism : but earnest thought and practical effort of our own are necessary in addition to all it gives us,—calm consideration of the difficulties, conditions, and tools of our time, valour to dare and perseverance to do, Baconian induction and Platonic ardour. It is in this spirit, and with this consciousness, that I would offer a few hints towards the solution of this great problem—To show Freedom her hands, to point out how the energy of Despotism may be in her reasoning eye, the power of Despotism in her willing arm.

It seems the natural order to inquire first into the constitution and functions of the central government. How is the ruling body to be got together? and, To the discharge of what duties is it competent when assembled?

With all its drawbacks and perils, representation must be accepted as one of the principal facts of modern civilization. For several centuries now the European nations have more and more clearly been laying hold of the idea, and more and more earnestly groping after its realization. It is a principle inwoven with the fundamental characteristics of Christian civilization, a principle sure to be evolved in that system of national life which was based on the Christian theory of man. It is the natural, and will ultimately be the triumphant, solution of the central problem of national life,—to preserve the individual freedom, to honour the individual reason and will, and yet to realize a national personality, a national unity, a national will. Every theory of government which is not founded on a recognition of the fact that government is a duty and function which a people calls certain of its citizens to perform has been gradually becoming obsolete. No colouring of eccentric genius, no obscurantism of political pedantry, will change into the robust verdure of spring the wan autumnal tint which overspreads all speculation, not having health and heart enough to acknowledge the sovereignty of man, inherent in the many, and deputed to the few. The only questions really remaining to be discussed are, how best the many may be taught to select the few, and how they may be brought loyally to obey them when selected.

Were it a vain attempt to endeavour to educate the population of a free country to these special duties and functions of freemen? It has been little thought of. Much surely might be done, both to awaken a sense of duty, and to guide to a selection of men.

Unless integrity reigns in the heart of the free elector, no hope can be entertained for a happy issue to the exercise of his office. Not only must virtue and honesty, generally considered, be advocated in a free country; freemen must be aroused to a sense of the nobleness, the responsibility, the sacredness, of the distinctive duties of the free. In a brave army, cowardice is reckoned more to be shunned than death; every brave soldier will rather die on his colours than abandon them. Travellers tell us of the Osmanli, that, however reduced they find him, how faded soever the glory of olden days, he yet regards with a silent pride the sabre that hangs at his belt, letting no speck stain its brightness, but stinting himself rather than part with a jewel in its sheath. It seems to whisper of the old might of Islam, to tell him that in his veins runs the blood of conquerors,—that he has in his heart a treasure dearer than life. Now, methinks, a freeman with a heart in his breast should treat an attempt to buy from him his honour,—to purchase his free voice,—as a true soldier would a charge of cowardice, or a valiant Osmanli a request to sell his sabre for a bit of bread. Every free-born elector of Britain or America possesses the birthright of a sacred duty; he has one act to perform which is worthy of the greatest, and for the right doing of which it were noble to die. “The honour of a freeman!”—this, in free nations, should be a formula for the expression of something stronger than death. But, on the other hand, might not the attempt at bribery be regarded as standing high in the list of crimes? Is such a thing impossible as high treason to the people; and is it unjust that it should be visited as severely as high treason to the prince?

And if the honour of freemen might be cherished, to guard the purity of election, its efficiency might unquestionably be promoted by the adoption of certain practicable methods, by which the body of electors in free nations should be guided, at least in an important degree, in the selection of representatives. It is surely somewhat strange that Mr Carlyle, instead of denouncing popular election in that unqualified and indignant manner, did not think it might be possible to give such directing hints to honest electors as would aid them in fixing upon the worthiest candidate for their suffrages. Men of all ranks having such an irresistible tendency to bow down to the hero, might it not be possible, to some extent, to point the said hero out? Is it so hard to indicate certain of the particular difficulties and dangers to be encountered by the elector? Would rough common sense, when set on its guard, be apt to be blinded by cajolery or fawning? Were it impossible to awaken electors to a feeling of the emptiness of mere talk, and train them to a habit of comparing words with actions? Is there not spread widely such a measure of intelligence among our working men, and the general body of our population, that they could, especially if urged and instructed, inform themselves of the past life of their proposed representative, and judge whether, from his bearing in what spheres he has occupied, he has the heart, the head, the arm of a man? Is it altogether hopeless that they might learn a total indifference to the jingle of the guineas in his purse, and ask neither of what blood he comes, nor what are his possessions; but whether he is a man of ability, uprightness, information, discreet valour, and religion, worthy to become a British lawgiver?

whom they may elect. The question admits, to say the least, of discussion, whether it is not advisable, in our British Islands, to find a larger body of men from which representatives can be obtained. It seems a reasonable idea that a larger class of British subjects might, beneficially to the commonwealth, have opened up to them a path into the House of Commons. The aristocratic and monied classes alone can at present enter there. Is it certain that there is not thus excluded an important and available portion of the intellect of the country? The shrewd, energetic, earnest citizen, of the lower order in the middle class, accustomed to think much and work hard, enters not. The bulk of the intellect of the fourth estate must rule without the doors of the Senate House. That a powerfully-minded member of the working class, who knows the feelings and wants of his brethren, should ever be admitted, seems to be regarded as an extravagant idea ; yet, can it be doubted that such an one might prove an abler senator than the gambler for fame with an abundance of money, or the brisk scion of the nobility, who can drive tandem and is a capital shot ? We scout the idea of paying our legislators in gold ; may they not occasionally make us pay for the honour of employing them in rarer coin ? A few evils might arise from making it possible for membership to become a trade ; would there arise a greater number than from continuing to make it a fashionable amusement ? There is no reason to doubt that governing bodies, of which the members have been or are paid, have proved themselves not one whit less patriotic than those where the practice has never been introduced. But why, at least, should not an extremely limited number of our representatives be paid ? No man of vigorous intellect and sound heart would think it demeaning to accept a bounty from his country, if he could not otherwise tender her his services ; nor would a scoff against such be tolerated in a British House of Commons.

The question of the functions to which the governing body in a free nation is competent is one of high importance. The notions which float in the public mind on this subject are vague, and not unfrequently erroneous. There is a tendency, fatal in its consequences, and decried by earnest men, to confound true freedom with laissez faire; as if liberty meant no rule at all, or as if it even implied any curtailing of the executive; instead of government, effective and comprehensive, by the best, with consent of all. National freedom is apt to be confounded with individual liberty, and thus to lose its significance and efficacy. A people may be nationally impotent from fear to meddle with personal rights. The idea is too common that in a free state the government ought to exercise little or no control over private affairs, and that the state is free in proportion as this is the case. It is forgotten that the essence of tyranny consists, not in the fact that men obey, but that they do so without knowing and comprehending the reason of their action; and that the life of freedom consists, not in any exemption from obeying, but in obedience, after due exercise of that will which God has implanted in men and nations, after assurance obtained that submission or active compliance are promotive of the general welfare, and assent asked and accorded. The error now opposed is based on a misconception of the very essence of liberty, one which dooms it to be utterly ineffective for any great national end. The sole characteristic of real freedom is, that a nation acts with consent and intelligence; you cannot decide whether a nation is free or enslaved by knowing what its government does, you must know how it does it. The man is as free who commands himself to be bound, with express directions that no attention be paid to any subsequent shrieks or implorings, in order that he may undergo an excruciating operation, as he who sweeps across the moorland on his own steed, or gazes over the face of a flashing sea from the deck of his own yacht. If a nation, acting through men by itself deputed, men who represent the national will, comes to the conclusion that the beauty of its cities would be enhanced by their streets being built according to plans approved by a body of qualified men, it continues a perfectly free state, though no one of its citizens can, at his own whim or caprice, inflict an architectural nuisance upon his fellow-townsmen. If it is discovered by a nation that the malconstruction of private dwellings frequently occasions fire and gives rise to extensive damage, or that the stupidity or carelessness of individuals results in the confusion of titles and the multiplication of quarrels and lawsuits, it may most freely appoint bodies of judicious men, architects and lawyers, to inspect plans and titles. And so on. The nation is ever free when itself wills the restraints which on itself it imposes. Until freedom takes a positive, and, as it were, aggressive attitude ; until it learns to extend its executive in various directions, and to bring the sifted intellect and the concentrated will of the nation to look upon with scrutinizing glance, and to order with energy and exactness, the various modes and departments of national life, it will never fully unfold its powers. As yet, it has not been fairly pitted against despotism. It may one day prove possible, with the perfect preservation of individual freedom, to pit national effort in free nations against national effort in despotisms, and to demonstrate that the analogy between the nation and the individual here too holds good ; that, as the free poet sings more sweetly and more thrillingly than he whose song is heard through a grating, and as three free warriors will hurl back a host of enslaved invaders, so a nation, which freely collects its reason, and gathers its will, and girds up its loins, and exerts itself in all manner of regulating and compelling action, will in peace tower in calm wisdom, a Pallas among the nations, and in war ride over their necks, as the proud vessel, with all sails set and every spar in order, but with a living will on board, rides over the poor slaves of moon and tempest, the wandering billows. It is the general obliviousness to this aspect of freedom, and the kindred phenomenon of testiness to all touching of so-called private rights, which have given edge and occasion to such denunciations on the part of Mr Carlyle as have been quoted.

On the subject of the relation between rank and rank in a free state, much might be said. It is unnecessary, however, to enter on its discussion, so ably and lucidly has it been treated by Mr Mill, Mr Greg, and others. "We have entered," says Mr Mill, "into a state of civilization in which the bond that attaches human beings to one another must be disinterested admiration and sympathy for personal qualities, or gratitude for unselfish services, and not the emotions of protectors towards dependants, or of dependants towards protectors." This relation, though difficult fully to realize, is at once possible and noble. There is a twofold error by which its attainment is impeded. One-half of society lauds freedom in name, and even verbally evinces a desire that it should be extended to all : while there is either an ignorance of its real character, demands, and difficulties, or an unwillingness to meet them ; a backwardness, above all, to embrace, in all its significance, the essential truth of freedom, that the soul of every man is of equal worth, and, of natural consequence, the hardship or inconvenience of one class no more to be deprecated than those of another. When the rich think of the poor, the ruling classes of the obeying, their ideas seem to run mainly on the retaining of these in quiet and content, in comfort, indeed, and it is to be hoped in happiness (for we are very tender-hearted), but in a condition of servile dependence ; and if this is the case, it is not to be wondered at that the patronized classes may entertain a half-suspicion of kindness, as if allied to alms-giving. On the other hand, there is exhibited by the working-classes, in their yearning towards freedom, an error, if possible, still more pernicious : the idea that this liberty for which they long is a certain worldly good ; the dim, half-conscious notion, that the free are those who sit at a well-furnished table, while the only partially free or enslaved pick up the crumbs ; and that the grand object to be held in view by these last is just to change places. Of the unnumbered errors that went to compound the idea to which the patriot Frenchman of 1793 gave the title of freedom, perhaps none was more insulting to the name of liberty and the soul of man than the conception, ever emerging in the tumult of the time, that freedom meant the procuring of some great accession of eatables and drinkables by the populace ; that it would prove the opening of exhaustless breasts of abundance ; that it was to be, in great measure, the satisfaction of the strong but not very sublime human faculty of greed. Now, there was just a particle of truth here, the particle, namely, that in a state of perfect and normal freedom, the physical condition of all classes would be the best possible in the circumstances ; but this is precisely the lowest truth for the sake of which a man can desire freedom ; and a pre-eminent cause why the stern republican goddess poured such indignant contempt upon the worship offered her by the patriots of France was, that they forgot the high blessings she sheds upon the spirit, and bent before her with the prayer that she would degrade herself to minister first and chiefly to the body. Freedom does not absolutely guarantee physical opulence to any class ; her aim is to fix every man in his station, and give him there his desert : to enable, on the one hand, the workman to toil with no feeling of inferiority or self-contempt, in the sense that it is not man and injustice, but God and nature, which ordain his labour and appoint his sphere, and in the deliberate and intelligent belief that it is in all respects, physical and spiritual, best for him that the man whom he obeys do actually command him, receiving, in respect of severer and more costly work than his own, a higher reward than he enjoys ; and, on the other hand, to take every ray of insulting pride or condescending insolence out of the eye of the master, as having no essential superiority over his employed, as deserving a kindly respect but no reverence, as simply doing in his sphere that duty which his equal but not equally endowed brother does in his.

Whether the precise form of the relation between the industrious classes and those who employ them may, to any considerable extent, and at an approaching time, undergo alteration, is a question of no small interest. It is a matter not open to dispute that the gradual superseding of the ancient method, of wages given by a master and work done by a servant, is, in extensive departments of our affairs, possible and desirable. It may be doubted whether there can be found any effective mode of counteracting that often deprecated tendency of civilization to concentrate wealth in certain quarters, save by carrying out the principle of co-operation in the manufacturing, and perhaps also the mercantile provinces. This, certainly, would be a thoroughly efficient means of that counteraction ; and it were hard to say how there could be pointed out, on the whole, a more perfectly wholesome and promising phenomenon in a state, than that of workmen, by force of thrift, sobriety, education, and sense, becoming their own employers. The achievement here being precious, the task is again difficult ; but the hope may be cherished that there is stamina in the British working class ultimately to effect it. Mr Greg has discussed this subject in a masterly manner.

To tell the working-classes that they are perfectly enlightened, and endowed with every manly virtue, that they are therefore unjustly treated by the higher ranks, while their country suffers from their not sharing more largely in political rights, is an extremely easy, but signally useless proceeding. It is gross flattery to our lower classes in general to say that they stand remarkably high in culture and moral worth ; the fact does not admit of disguise, that the work of their education, using the word in its widest sense, has yet, in very great measure, to be done. Britain, besides, possesses such an amount of freedom, that no class within her borders, morally and intellectually strong, can be long defrauded of its substantial rights, or excluded from its natural station. We have not to win our freedom ; we have but to learn to use it ; and the higher classes may learn boldness in proceeding with reform, and the lower encouragement in waiting, from the fact that revolution, for the attainment of any political privileges in our island, would now constitute an absolute novelty in the history of nations. Can any man conceive so large a number of British citizens as would constitute a force sufficient to make itself felt by the Government of the empire, deliberately putting life and living to the hazard for all that an almost ideal reform could offer ? In moral and intellectual education ; in loyal and temperate, but steady and determined, aiming after complete political enfranchisement ; in the acquisition of an intellectual power to discern their true position, with all its possibilities and perils, as affected by modern invention, and the attainment of a moral ability to accommodate themselves thereto ; in gradually becoming fit to be their own masters ; in bridling passion, and subduing intoxication ; lies the true game of the working-classes.

What intellectual and moral education can be made consistent with the practical operations of each of the employments of the body of the people ought to be earnestly aimed at ; and it may, with some measure of distinctness, be perceived in what direction efforts of this kind should proceed. Machinery may become the slave of intellectual progress, by doing for us our rude and physical work. As by a spell of supreme potency, modern science and invention have summoned to our aid, to be our unresisting and irresistible ministers, the mechanical powers which thunder in a thousand factories, and hang their black smoke-banners over our towns. Is it impossible that such advantage be taken of their capabilities that a larger amount of leisure than heretofore may be found for purely intellectual pursuits by our mechanical workmen? And may not the inventive exercise, which was formerly found in individual operations, be advantageously foregone, for the sake of the enhanced freshness of intellect and keenness of relish with which he who has been engaged during working hours in a mechanical employment will turn at its close to the pursuit of science, or the study of literature? The manufacturing workmen, we are informed by Mr M'Culloch, are a particularly intelligent class; and the free libraries of Manchester and Liverpool, with their ranges of quiet, studious, dignified, and happy readers, give surely a conclusive testimony to the truth of his words. And if workmen gradually became their own masters, and could thus to some extent control the feverish intensity of manufacturing competition, how nobly consistent with freedom, and how plainly practicable, were this whole scheme of advancement! Hope, then, for the education of the working class must rest on two things: first, that working hours be shortened; and, second, that operatives prove themselves possessed of the moral power, and the capability of intellectual pleasure, which alone would make such curtailment a blessing, and not a curse. I am not insensible to the difficulties which are to be met with in any attempt at improvement here; they are stern, complicated, all but overpowering; but however steep and rugged the way, there is no other.

It were a depressing consideration, if, to the calmest and most careful thought, it seemed an impossibility that freedom might yet achieve triumphs unexampled, perhaps undreamed of, in the history of the world. It were Utopian, indeed, if this attainment were represented as easy ; and all that has been here said would deserve to be put aside with a pitying smile, if it had been implied that by one effort, or through the wisdom, theoretic and practical, of any one scheme, a nation was to be regenerated. But if the realization of perfect freedom is confessed to be in every aspect a work of difficulty, and if hopes of this realization are based upon the gradual, almost or altogether imperceptible, pervasion of the nation by a deeper nobleness and a more substantial intelligence, it is not easy to see on what a charge of Utopianism can be founded. And as we set out from Christianity, as we found in it the basis upon which a system of free social relations could be reared, it is only by returning to Christianity, and finding in it a golden band to unite the whole in safety, harmony, and beauty, that we can irrefragably demonstrate the possibility of such advance as has been indicated. The real happiness of freedom was never in the course of human history attained by a nation morally weak ; licentious, irreverent, feeling itself bound by no relations to an unseen world. The alliance of freedom and irreligion, which we have seen attempted in these latter ages, is anomalous and impossible. Show me a sniffing, unbelieving, debauched, playacting thing, gesticulating on its platform or stump, swelling with conceit and self-importance, listening open-eared for any faint breath of applause, basely flattering the crowd before it, mere animal greed in its eye, mere tirade about the felicity of the rich and the removal of taxes on its lips, and I will show you that which no earthly power will ever make free. That heart has not width enough to hold the love of freedom, that poor head cannot form its very conception ; it is but an imaginary and absurd delusion of which that tongue is prating :

freedom disowns the whole exhibition. But show me a working man, who, from his own fireside, with his loving wife beside him, and his children smiling in his face, can look beyond earth and time, and see a King, from whom he holds a charter of freedom, seated on an eternal throne, the rays from His eye falling equally on the king and the peasant, the oak and the lichen ; who has not contracted his wishes and thoughts upon the spreading of his table and the covering of his back, or on anything which he will have to surrender to the grasp of death ; who has not denied his immaterial existence, but knows that it is as a thinking, reasoning, loving spirit, that man has a real existence and a perennial nobleness ; and I will show you one on whom freedom will look with hope.

ASSOCIATIVE ACTION AND CHRISTIAN PHILANTHROPY.

IN the preceding chapter we had before us the social life mainly in that broader aspect in which it pertains to the nation as such. But voluntary association among the citizens of a free State, independently of the central power, is a natural and inevitable growth of freedom. It is a phenomenon, also, of so great prominence in the most recent civilization of free countries, and has been an agency so powerful in political reform, in social amelioration, and in the missionary movement, that it demands careful consideration. The spirit of Christianity has entered into it in many forms ; and unless we have some clearness of idea concerning it, we cannot accurately appreciate that great agency of Christian Philanthropy which is associated with the names and the achievements of Howard and of Wilberforce.

In his essay on The Signs of the Times, an essay marked by his usual penetrating intellectual energy, and perhaps remarkable, even among his essays, for the brilliant and musical terseness of its style, Mr Carlyle divides the forces which act in human affairs into the dynamic or individual forces, love, religion, enthusiasm, and so on; and the mechanical, which arise from organization and union. His distinction and classification may be accepted as correct; but he has omitted to define the connection between the two provinces of human affairs on which he comments. In the close of his essay he distinctly recognises the soundness and necessity of each set of forces. One man conceives an idea or perceives a truth: many men must unite to carry out or to diffuse it. But has he fully considered how the machinery of association and the dynamics of individual power are related? The connection is that of simple, proportional, indissoluble sequence. The machinery arises from the dynamics, the organized and united force results from the individual, by a necessity which cannot be exhibited, because its negation cannot be even conceived. An army of which the soldiers are drilled, marshalled, and then enlisted; a tree that unfolds its leaves, and strikes down its stem, and finally deposits its seed;—these are conceptions precisely analogous to that of a corn-law league or a missionary society which has not originated in individual force. Goethe said his opinion was infinitely strengthened by the assent of even one. The strength to be found in the assent and co-operation of numbers is the aim of that machinery for the carrying on of various objects which seems to Mr Carlyle to be in such excess in our time. An individual or dynamic force acts in an individual bosom; it is communicated to another bosom, to a third, to a fourth: these all now have a common bond, and constitute a common force; a society, an organization, if you will, a machine, is formed. The machinery must always be in a precise ratio to the dynamics. Whence is it, then, that we see so little machinery in the olden time, say in the time of Luther, and so much in our day? For a simple and conclusive reason. Before Luther could at all disseminate his views, he also had, by immoveable necessity, to find and form his machinery: men heard his voice, and gathered round him; and he was speedily in the centre of a square with fixed bayonets, powerful for aggression or defence. The effectiveness of this square, besides, depended accurately on the amount of the dynamic force in each breast ; the more perfect the individual, the more perfect the machine. But Luther, or any man of Luther's time, had a much harder task to perform in securing his machinery, than any man can have now-a-days. It is, we have seen, the great leading characteristic of our age, that thought is more fluent, that men more easily communicate and draw together, than was ever the case in this world. It is because every dynamic force can now, with extreme facility, gather round it a machinery, that the land is covered with organizations and societies. Had Luther lived now, he had found it a more easy task to spread his doctrines than he did in the sixteenth century ; but he could not, by any possibility, have spread them without gathering round him a living machine of men. If, therefore, desirous of urging a point, we said that Mr Carlyle, in opposing these two provinces of our affairs, in saying we have too much machinery, and too little dynamics, gave expression to a sheer natural impossibility, we should speak the actual truth ; every human organization must originate in dynamic, in individual force. The truth, of course, is, that it is in the latter we must always look for the evil ; change the quality of your dynamic force, and all, save some matter of practical detail, is done ; and it may be legitimate to put this interpretation upon Mr Carlyle's essay, and benefit by his superb enforcement of the great duty of purifying the nation's heart that the issues of its life may be pure. In those stern old ages it was a serious matter for a man to gain his machinery ; it was only when he saw, as by the light of a cherub's sword, and felt himself commanded to speak, as by a voice from a bush burning yet not consumed, that he would risk his life for his doctrine. In our day, every man who has a crotchet and a well or not very well hung tongue, can gather his company, can form his association, can construct his machine. Would you wonder that the flower which grows in the hothouse has a sicklier look than that whose roots had to cling to the solid rock in the scowl of the norland blast? Mr Carlyle looked over the luxuriant field of modern society, and saw the growth of organizations most abundant, in great measure a growth of weeds; let us, accepting the hard-won conditions of our time, recognise it as well that plants spring quickly, but direct all energy to pluck up weeds, and to examine the seed sown.

There is not anything positively new in the idea of Christian Philanthropy. It is as old as love. Its history began to be written in the first tear which fell from a human eye, over one whose only claim was pity, and whose only plea was sorrow. But no proof is necessary that there is such a thing in our day as "the philanthropic movement:" simple pity,—love for the wretched as such,—has become a more formal and recognisable power in our time than formerly.

The following are here accepted as the fundamental positions of Christian Philanthropy.

I. In the system of human affairs there is a distinct, traceable, and indispensable function to be performed by compassion.

II. All men are, in a definable sense, equal. All human law is grounded on expediency; on what is temporal, and not eternal. Revenge is foreign to the idea of law.

III. It is not a possible case that hatred be the highest and most reasonable feeling with which one human being can regard another. There cannot upon earth exist, in the human form, any one whom it is not noble and holy to love.

IV. It is impossible, in this world, that the traces of the Divine image be absolutely obliterated from the human soul. God has not revealed to man any period at which it is either incumbent on or lawful for him to abandon hope and effort that his brother may attain to that higher nature which is at once the restoration and the elevation of humanity.

These positions are closely connected with each other, and a more searching analysis might doubtless afford clearer lines of demarcation ; but, for practical purposes, they may serve. The first is the general declaration with which philanthropy, as such, sets out. The second leads us to define its true relation to justice. The third is intimately associated with the second, and is the Christian rule of feeling, as expressed by our Saviour. The fourth indicates the rationale of every effort towards reclamation of the criminal or condemned.

At its first arising, Philanthropy was hailed with acclamation. Without hesitation, apparently without question, and almost with universal voice, men affirmed its light to be holy, and its influence, of necessity, benign. Be the cause, however, what it may, we now find matters altered. Philanthropy, it is true, has pervaded the nation, and more is done at the simple cry of compassion than was ever done before ; but it has been assailed with vituperation and contempt, scarcely condescending to argue ; while it furnishes every petty novelist and scribbler with subjects of caricature, and targets for small arrows that stick because they are viscous with venom, not because they are pointed with wit. The chief argumentative assailant of Philanthropy is a man whose words must always deserve calm and thorough consideration—Mr Carlyle. Caricaturists and small wits might be left to shift for themselves, were it not an error to suppose that nothing can injure which has little force, or that men are not in the habit, every day, and scores of times every day, of holding apples so near to their eyes that they shut out the light of the sun. A few words (and they shall be as few as possible) may not be wholly wasted on the subject of the ridicule to which Philanthropy is in our day exposed ; they may prove applicable to the sense of the ridiculous as exercised on every kind of religious or moral action or emotion.

The sense of the ridiculous is extremely valuable in man or nation. In every department of art, of literature, and of life, it prunes a fantastic or grotesque exuberance, keeping down, to give it in one word, excessive idiosyncrasy. It is, by its nature, in close league with common sense; it is the mortal foe of bombast, sentimentality, softness, and every sort of pretence. The strong sense of the ridiculous inherited by the English people is one of the healthiest characteristics. It may at present threaten to degenerate into a universal titter; but, in its native strength and soundness, it preserves us in a fine mean between the French and the Germans; between the "gesticulating nation that has a heart, and wears it on its sleeve," and the nation that thinks walls, and holds the empire of the air.* There is much in our literature at present which might be bettered by a little smart satire; it is a tonic we cannot well do without.

No exemption is to be claimed for Philanthropy from the restraining or tempering power of a sound sense of the ridiculous, resulting in manly and discriminating satire. Like every other human thing, it may run into absurdity or excess, and, in particular instances, may furnish legitimate objects of caricature.

But satire has its laws: as sure and imperative laws as any other species of composition. And in these it certainly is included, both that it must never be absolutely in error, and that it must never be absolutely frivolous. There is a rational mirth which comports with earnestness and reve-

* "Gentlemen, think the wall!"—these were the words in which Fichte commenced his philosophic lectures in Jena. However idealistic, we can scarcely conceive a British audience not being touched with a feeling of drollery by the words: the Germans sat like stucco. Let it not be thought from this remark that I intend the faintest disrespect for the majestic genius and noble character of Fichte.

rence, and is beautiful as the smile of natural and fearless strength ; but there is such a thing as the laughter of intellectual paralysis ; and what more ghastly than that ? Laughter is noble and profitable ; but not that of the madman when he sets the house on fire, or that of the fool who goes to wedding and funeral with the same mindless grin. Its office is to prune the excrescences that will adhere to the best of human things, to prevent stupidity, pretension, or weak enthusiasm, from attaching their distorting or encumbering insignia to any form of truth. But it becomes at once of malign influence, if its attacks menace the truth itself, if, in cutting away excess of foliage, it draws the vital sap from the tree, if, in curing the squint, it cuts out the eye. Sound satire should clear from all stains the statue of truth ; but it should make men love to gaze on that statue the more. And, since satire is of prevailing influence, since it acts upon the mind with a more subtle insinuation, and often exerts a greater power of unconscious mental modification than argument, it is of serious importance that this fact be constantly borne in mind.

In the caricatures we have had of Philanthropy, this fundamental law has been infringed. There has been a fatal want of discrimination of the true from the false : qualities radically and perennially holy, human in the noblest sense, and dignifying humanity, have been confounded with their morbid excess, or left to appear altogether absurd and ignoble. One or two words will make this plain.

There are three circles in which, in his life on earth, and the discharge of his earthly duties, a man may act. The first is that of self ; one must always, by duty and necessity, do more for himself, or in connection with himself, than for any one else. The second is that of family and friends, of all those who have a claim on one by blood or friendship : within this circle a man must perform certain duties, or he meets universal reprobation and contempt. The third is that of humanity in general. It were an insult to our readers to prove to them that this is truly and properly a sphere of human duty ; although there are not wanting writings in our day whose tendency seems to indicate it as an insult to suppose one to doubt the reverse : it is unnecessary to eliminate the fact, which used to be considered as good as settled, that a man is by nature united in mysterious but ennobling bonds with every other man, and that it is not one of the characteristics of a high state of humanity, that it be separated into families and coteries, each attending to its own affairs, like so many families of wolves in the pine forest ; readers may be supposed to agree that severance, disunion, isolation, selfishness, are symptoms of disease in the human race, and that the evolution of the ages, if it tends to any consummation whatever, must tend to their termination. Not only, however, is this sphere noble ; it may be further asserted, still without necessity of formal proof, that it is this third sphere where, save in rare instances, nobleness as such has existence. A man who performs well his duties to himself, who has no higher object than that he may be undisturbed and happy, we shall not call noble. In the second circle are many of the loveliest spectacles which our earth can show ; the affection of brothers and of sisters, the self-sacrificing nobleness of friendship, the sacred beauty of a mother's love. But, leaving the question of friendship (which, indeed, holds, in its pure form, of the high and the immortal), domestic feelings and spectacles, as such, take rank among the natural productions of our planet ; the loveliest perhaps we have to show, but of a beauty precisely analogous to that of the rose and the fountain, and essentially pertaining to time. By neglecting family duties, one becomes less than a man ; by performing them never so well, he comes not to merit applause. Distinctive nobleness commences in the third circle. It is when one rises above self and family, and looks abroad on the family of mankind, that he takes the attitude which in a man is essentially great ; when one no longer feels around him the little necessities which compel, or the little pleasures which allure, and yet is able to contemplate men as a great brotherhood of immortals with a gaze analogous to that of Him in whose image man is made ; when one passes beyond what he shares with the lower orders of creation, and soars to those regions where, as an intelligent, God-knowing creature, he may sit among the angels ; when one can look on the world through the light of eternity ; then it is that he does what it is the distinctive privilege and nobleness of man on this earth to do, what marks him as animated by those emotions to which, under God, humanity owes all it has achieved in time. All this is so plain, and so absolutely certain, that statement embraces proof.

What excuse, then, could be pled for a satire which endangered this peculiar nobleness of humanity, and perpetually read to man the lesson that he should mind himself, or, at most, his family, or, at very most, some interesting family which he fancied, much as he might rabbits or pigeons ? A very superfluous lesson, to be sure ! For one man or woman who neglects self or family from actual desire to promote the welfare of the human race, ten thousand, at the very least, neglect the latter for the former. Human indolence and selfishness require no aid from satire to make men ever sink back into their own little circles, into their own little hearts ! Go out to your lawn in the evening after a shower, when the earthworms are looking out, and commence to lecture them on the paramount importance of home duties ; how it is proper to keep their holes tidy, and attend to the respectable upbringing of their children ; how they have duties enough at their own doors, and it cannot be too earnestly enforced on them that they ought not to look much towards the stars, just beginning to come out, and so very far away ; but spare your sweet breath, and abandon the quite superfluous task of bidding men cultivate selfishness, and withdraw their eyes from looking in love towards the ends of the earth. Holy and beautiful are home duties and home delights ; these may nowise be neglected or scorned : but God did not kindle the smile of the winter hearth, or the warmer smile of the true wife, God did not fill home with the musical voices of children, and the thousand “ hopes, and fears that kindle hope, an undistinguishable throng,” that these should be his all to a man, that no voice should reach him from the outer world. These are a solace after his work, these are rewards of his toil ; but these can never furnish him the tasks that mark him distinctively as a man. It is when we widen our sphere of vision and of love,—a sphere which will go on widening to eternity,—and not when we contract it, that we become noble and man-like.

Looking upon contemporary satire, do we not meet, on all hands, with forms of ridicule,—with quiet sneers, with rude horse-laughter, with elaborate figures, of high broad brows, and breasts calm and cold as marble, and with sign-painter daubs, that are human only in bearing human names, but otherwise as dead as spoiled canvass,—all meant to raise the laugh against a Philanthropy that would look abroad ? Let care be taken lest, while we laugh, our unconscious hearts are robbed of the purest spark of celestial fire lingering within. When we look at the delicate and living lines in the stately statue of a St John Rivers, or at the mechanic movements, utterly removed from all possibility of sympathy, and to be condemned as abortive and inconceivable by every canon of mere criticism, in a Mrs Jellyby, let us beware lest we recoil too strongly from the finely and almost soundly satirized excess of the one, and from the hideous and unmitigated atrocity of the other, into what is, in the former, however painted, after all but human passion, or into what is offered as the right morality in contrast with the absurdities of the other, a silly and simpering good-nature, that never looks beyond its own little ring, and such objects as can look well and draw mawkish tears in the pages of a novel. Let it be remembered also, that, whatever may be the case with morbid idiosyncrasy, it is in general the heat which warms most that casts its warming influence farthest. The cottages of Cardington, as we shall see, did not suffer because Howard was visiting the sick-beds on the shores of the Bosphorus !

These words cannot be considered uncalled for. Many, it is to be feared, when their hearts, in the first ardour of youth, were beginning to expand with holy desires, that told of their brotherhood or sisterhood with earth's nobles and standard-bearers, have felt them contract again to the mere every-day feelings of home and neighbourhood, under the influence of such satire as we have been considering ; satire which would laugh at Plato as he trod, afar from men, the lone mountains of thought, which would keep David ever at the sheepfold, and John ever at the net. Enough now of this phase of the subject.

Philanthropy, as was said, has been attacked by Mr Carlyle. It has been attacked with weapons of argument, and with those of fiercest scorn, declared "a phosphorescence and unclean," and rejected from among the agencies to be regarded with hope by those who desire the common weal. By considering the case in the precise light in which he views it, we come directly and conveniently to the heart of the whole question, to the determination of the relation borne by Philanthropy to justice.

Mr Carlyle's conception of the origin of human law is at the root of his opinions on the whole subject of Philanthropy. In reference to the object of law, he has these words :—
"Example, effects upon the public mind, effects upon this and upon that—all this is mere appendage and accident.” “Revenge,” he says again, “my friends!—revenge, and the natural hatred of scoundrels, and the ineradicable tendency to revancher one’s-self upon them, and pay them what they have merited: this is for evermore intrinsically a correct, and even a divine, feeling in the mind of every man.” And, once more, after putting the case of a man having, in the fury of passion, slain another,—“My humane friends, I perceive this same sacred glow of Divine wrath, or authentic monition at first-hand from God himself, to be the foundation for all criminal law,” &c. Mr Carlyle’s theory of law, then, is, that it proceeds from and gratifies revenge.

The explicative word of Mr Carlyle’s whole system of belief is “hero-worship.” With his pantheistic views his theory of human law is in perfect philosophic consistency. If the great and good man is to be worshipped as a god, the bad man is to be hated as a devil. But if the good man is not a god, and the bad man not a devil, but both subjects of an infinite King, whose law fixes the relation between them, it may be quite otherwise.

Enough has already been advanced to invalidate the theory of hero-worship; but it may be useful to have another look at it from a plain, historical point of view.

Two great classes may be distinguished among the leaders of mankind: those who have exercised their influence by power not moral, and those who made an appeal to the moral nature of man. By the first class are meant such men as Napoleon, Cæsar, and Alexander; by the second, such men as Mahomet, Zoroaster, and Moses. The former were mere embodiments of force; their soldiers trusted and followed them, because armies were in their hands as thunderbolts. The captain of banditti, whose eye sees farther and whose arm smites more powerfully than those of his followers, exercises an influence in kind precisely similar. Anything analogous to worship is foreign to every such case ; a fact rendered palpable and undeniable by the simple reflection that there is no feeling of an infinite respect, as due to what is infinite, manifested in these or the like instances. A supple-kneed Greek might have knelt to Alexander, "if Alexander wished ;" but no proclamations could make a Greek believe that Alexander could lay his hand on the lightning, or impart life to an insect. There is, however, another class of great men, with whose influence on their fellows worship has been ever and intimately connected ; this may be represented by Mahomet, Zoroaster, and Moses. Here, then, the point at issue comes directly before us. Worship did originate in each of these cases. Whence did it arise ? Mark the men in their work, and listen to their words. Mahomet arose and said, "Ye have been worshipping dumb idols, that are no gods : look up to Allah ; there is no god but Allah !" His words were not in vain. Zoroaster arose and said, "Ye have wandered from the truth which your fathers knew and followed ; I bring you it back fresh from the fountains of heaven." Men gave ear to him also. Moses came to the children of Israel, and said, "I AM hath sent me unto you." They heard the word, and followed him ; through the cloven surges, into the howling wilderness, whithersoever he listed. Whom did men obey and worship in each of these cases ? Did they worship Mahomet when he pointed his finger upwards to Allah ? Did they obey the commandments of Moses when he gave them the tables where God's hand had traced words under the canopy of cloud and fire ? Surely we may say with plainness and certainty, No. It was ever the Sender that was worshipped, not the sent ; it was the belief in his alliance with an exterior, an infinite power, which won him his influence. He has brought us fire from heaven ! Such in all ages has been the cry of men, as they looked, their eyes radiant with joy and thankfulness, on the priest or prophet, and ranged themselves under his guidance. The crown and sceptre which men have most highly honoured, and most loyally obeyed, have always been believed to have come down from heaven ; men have not worshipped the spirit of a man, or the breath in his nostrils, but the Spirit to whom he turned them. The rudest Polynesian islander probably regards with profounder veneration the black, unchiselled, eyeless idol to which he bows down, than the wisest and mightiest chieftain he knows : the one holds of the unseen and the infinite, the other he can look upon, and examine, and compass in his thought ; to the one he may look in the day of battle, of the other he will think in the shadow of the thunder-cloud ; the one he will respect and obey, the other alone will he worship. Go into the portrait gallery of the Venetians, and mark there the “victorious Doges, painted neither in the toil of battle nor the triumph of return, nor set forth with crowns and curtains of State, but kneeling always crownless, and returning thanks to God for his help, or as priests interceding for the nation in its affliction.” That spectacle illustrates well the relative regards of men towards their greatest, and towards their God.

But some one indignantly exclaims, Why, in the first place, all this is the extreme of triteness ; and, in the second, Mr Carlyle, by his doctrine of hero-worship, means really nothing more. No great originality is claimed in connection with the matter, and certainly the truth maintained, whatever it wants, is clothed in the majesty of age ; so strictly in accordance with human instinct is it, that it probably sounded by no means strangely in the ears of men, when Moses, bidding them turn from those whose “breath was in their nostrils,” was commissioned to write it down, an eternal truth for eternal remembrance, in the Book of Deuteronomy. But, however this may be, and even though what has been said might be sanctioned by Mr Carlyle, it is enough to reverse his whole theory of human affairs. It is sufficient to show that the term "hero-worship" is an absurdity, or worse ; to indicate the true significance of those phenomena of universal history which Mr Carlyle has categorized under that term ; and, at least, to lead to the overthrow of his theory that law originates in revenge. It were difficult to compute the practical importance of the truths to which, under the name of hero-worship, he has directed our attention ; but it was a true and pregnant remark of Mackintosh, that, in the construction of theory, partial truth is equivalent to error. Granted that men have honoured men ; granted that, in every department of human endeavour, the point to be aimed at, for health, prosperity, and advancement, is to obtain qualified men. But, when Mr Carlyle associates this fact with worship, he misses an all-important distinction which reveals the highest lessons of what he names hero-worship. This distinction is, sooth to say, very simple. If a city is surrounded by armed squadrons and a line of circumvallation ; if the townsmen are in terror that no quarter will be given them, but yet, because of a scorching thirst which threatens to kill them by slow torment, are proceeding to open their gates ; if, then, suddenly one of their number discovers, in a spot hitherto unthought of, a well of cool and abundant water ; if his fellow-citizens crowd around him, and grasp his hand, and look on him with tears of joy—what shall we see in the spectacle ? Respect for him, or delight at the discovery of the fountain ? Entirely the latter. When a man, looking heavenward, cries out, I see heaven opened, and the light streams forth—lift up your eyes, and see it for yourselves ; when men hear, and believe, and bestir themselves, and exclaim, It is even so : we see the light, we feel ourselves being drawn nearer to it, and mayest thou be blessed for showing it to us—what shall we see in the spectacle ? Shall we regard it as a testimony of man to man, or of man to God? As the latter. We look with Mr Carlyle along human history; we see men paying the highest honour to their Mahomets and Zoroasters; we see the character of whole epochs moulded by this honour; we see nations gathering round these, and willing, one would say, to cement for them thrones in their hearts' blood; and from the whole we learn, not the divinity of man, but the fact that the deep human instinct has in all ages looked for a God. The louder the shouts arise of what Mr Carlyle calls hero-worship, the more definitely and decisively will they proclaim with us, that hero-worship, in any permissible or definable sense, is contradicted by the united voice of humanity.

We find ourselves led, then, by the path trodden by Mr Carlyle, to the throne where God sits, King of the universe. Is it possible to eliminate a theory of law in consistence with this truth?

There is one argument of a somewhat metaphysical nature bearing strongly against the theory of revenge, which it may be worth while to adduce in the outset. It proceeds on the hypothesis that there is an intelligent and almighty Governor of the universe. It may be introduced by a well-known quotation:—

“ Alas! alas!

Why, all the souls that were, were forfeit once;
And He that might the vantage best have took Found out the remedy: How would you be,
If He, which is the top of judgment, should
But judge you as you are? O, think on that;
And mercy then will breathe within your lips,
Like man new made.”

It would be rash to consider this a mere echo of popular sentiment on the part of Shakspeare: these words came manifestly from depths in the greatest merely human heart that ever beat; they embody one of those thoughts that wander farthest into eternity. When thinking or speaking of the Infinite Being, we cannot proceed by calculation of degrees : absolute purity is stained by a mote as certainly as by a whole atmosphere of hell's darkness. If it is the eternal law of justice that the reasonable being affected with sin be hated, we cannot go about to say, so much will be hated, so much will be tolerated, and so on. Now, Mr Carlyle will certainly not deny that sin adheres to the whole human race : set on a ground of perfect light, he will allow our species, as a whole, to look black. He sees a brother man commit some atrocious crime ; with what he calls a glow of divine wrath, he slays him. It being a divine emotion to hate that being because affected with sin, it must be also divine, in one of absolute holiness, to hate and exterminate every creature so affected, even by the smallest speck that infinite light can reveal. It will follow that the Divine Being could no more suffer sin for a moment than during a whole dispensation. If this is so, how is it that the human race exists ? How is it that God did not lift his foot in anger, and crush our planet into annihilation as a loathsome worm staining the azure of immensity ? Really there is no answer : if hatred is the highest and holiest emotion with which a man can regard a fellow-creature affected with sin, if this fact is the real foundation of justice, and if an infraction of justice here is an infraction of essential right, there cannot be conceived a reason why a sinful species could subsist in God's world. There are limits to which this argument might be pressed for which it would not remain valid. But the present is the economy of mercy and hope ; and the long-suffering which is at present extended by God to man may surely be extended by man to his fellow. " Be ye therefore merciful as your Father also is merciful." Is there a living man, or has there ever been a man, who could deliberately consider that his distance from the purity of the Infinitely Holy was less than the distance of his most sinful brother from him ? Is there any of the sons of men who could deliberately challenge his Maker to cast a stone at him? If such there be, let him hold to the theory that hatred and revenge are the emotions with which God now regards the sinner; if there is none such, that theory chains the noblest human soul that ever existed, on the eternal rock of despair.

This preliminary argument suggests a distinction which lies at the basis of all that is to follow—that, namely, between moral evil and the soul it pollutes. This distinction Mr Carlyle overlooks or ignores, yet on it all depends. God eternally and infinitely hates sin, and no bounds are to be placed to the hatred with which it is right for men to regard it; but precisely as “hero-worship” was found not to indicate infinite love and honour as due to men, but as directed towards the fountain of light, so the efforts men have made to exterminate the excessively wicked from among them, indicate hatred of their brethren only in a secondary and temporary sense, and point chiefly to the abyss of blackness which their iniquity reveals.

It cannot be necessary to prove the possibility of drawing this great distinction, or its reality when drawn. Every man could understand and sympathise with Coleridge when he said he would tolerate men, but for principles he would have no toleration. The peasant Christian sees no mystery in that passage where God is asserted to have no pleasure in the death of the sinner, although the whole Bible testifies His exterminating abhorrence of sin. Every parent distinguishes between the hated offence and the loved offender, when he punishes his child. And have not men ever borne witness to an instinctive feeling of this distinction? Bad as the world is, there perhaps was never a scaffold erected, and a man put to death upon it, for whom, whatever his crime, certain eyes in the crowd were not filled with the dew of pity. Have not some nations treated the condemned, previously to their execution, with condoling kindness? Or what find we in that spectacle exhibited in Paris, on the autumn evening in 1792, which Mr Carlyle has painted for us as with the brush of Michael Angelo? The Septembriseurs, maddened with rage, their arms to the elbow clotted with gore, their whole aspect that of unchained demons, clasped to their breasts, with the audible weeping of irrepressible joy, any one among the prisoners who was pronounced guiltless and snatched from the jaws of death. Even they witnessed to the fact, that it is a stern work for man to be the executioner of man. It is the mark of the evil one perceived on a fellow-creature that is hated, not that creature himself. Would to God, men say from their inmost hearts, we could part this evil from you ; but we cannot, and we must expel it from the midst of us ; you must go with it. The tainted spot must be cut out ; but while the knife is being whetted, the tear is being shed.

Revenge performs a function in human affairs. Even in the precise mode in which Mr Carlyle pictures its exercise, it may, in rare cases, come legitimately into action.

“ The forked weapon of the skies can send Illumination into deep, dark holds,
Which the mild sunbeam hath not power to pierce.”

Where the calm voice of law cannot be heard, or its hand cannot strike, then revenge may start forth to assert humanity and justice.

Keeping steadily in view the distinction between the sinner and his sin, we can have little difficulty in discovering the origin and defining the function of human law.

Man, in all ages and circumstances, presents two grand aspects : that of the individual ; and that of the civis, or member of society.

It is not a mere theological dogma, that man is king of this lower world—that his relation to his fellows is different from that he bears to the inferior animals. Is there not a certain mystical sacredness attaching to the life of a man ? Is there any degree of idiocy or insanity which will turn aside that flaming sword with which conscience pursues the murderer? In the remotest desert, in the depth of the sequestered wood, why is it that he who deliberately slays his fellow feels that he is not unseen?—that, though no human power will ever reach him, there is a tribunal before which he will appear—One to whom his brother's blood can cry even from the ground? Is it not because there is a sense in which all men are equal—their differences relative, their equality essential? And what but this can we understand by the inherent majesty imputed by sages and poets to man? What but this renders it a glorious thing, however slender my capacities, that I have the gift of a human soul? Not only is it that the grandeurs and harmonies of nature are disposed for the delight and exaltation of all, not only that

And the infinite magnificence of heaven
Fix'd, within reach of every human eye;
The sleepless ocean murmurs for all ears;
The vernal field infuses fresh delight Into all hearts :”

from which sublime truth a metaphysical as well as a poetical argument for essential human brotherhood might perhaps be drawn : the very fact that the human eye has been opened, as no other being's on earth has been, to see the face of the one God, seems a sufficient proof that there remains for man, from every power on earth, an ultimate appeal. The destinies of men are bounded, not by time, but by eternity ; the human soul is a denizen, not only of earth, but of the universe :

if indeed the seraphim can claim a glory equal to that of the soul of man, will always assert a claim to the citizenship of heaven, and a power of appeal to the judgment of God. The right by which any earthly power can judge and punish the individual man must be delegated.

Neither is it merely a theological dogma that the human race is in a state of imperfection, and of effort towards some higher condition. It is a historical fact. Call it what you will,—account for it as you may,—the human race, in its history in time, has been marked by one grand characteristic, unique in this world. That characteristic is a visible effort towards some development,—a progress, or aim at progress. Our species has not the aspect of one who has finished his journey, but of one still proceeding in it,—not of one who has cultivated his field, and can sit down to enjoy it, but of one who still sees it untilled and encumbered with rocks ; humanity has always shown a brow darkened with care and dissatisfaction, an eye fixed on the distance, a staff in the hand. We need not ask whither it is bound ; but, beyond question, it has ever been going ; never could it lay itself down to sleep ; never could it build itself an eternal city ; ever its most heroic aspect has been displayed when it aroused itself, and set out anew on its march. But the deepest thinkers have recognised that, along with this characteristic of progress, the human species is distinguished by that also of a remarkable and pre-eminent unity. You cannot individualize man so far as to separate him from his species ; in the wolf-child of India, in the maniac of solitary confinement, you see what man is when separated from man. In the unity of the species, or its irresistible tendency towards unity, originated society. Society assumed a power which no individual man can claim,—the power to touch the human life ; this power was conferred on it by God ; and the form in which He revealed to man that it belonged to him was, the necessity, stern and painful indeed, by which he was driven to exercise it.

The perfect development of human unity,—the attainment of all that man can do or become in a civic capacity, while individual right and individual freedom are preserved,—is the aim of civilization. The machinery of human civilization is vast and various ; one of its principal parts is—law.

Where, then, precisely are we to look for the origin of law? To the relation between the two entities,—the individual and the society. If we can find any reason why the society should originate law, we shall have discovered that of which we are in quest. We have not far to look : we find it by a glance at individual passion. At what time law commenced, it is beyond our scope to inquire ; whether its origin was in any respect supernatural or not, is of no moment at present ; but certainly it was when untamed passion was seen tearing the weak and defenceless ; when individual greed, individual lust, individual hate, and, most cruel and perilous of all, individual revenge, ranged, like beasts of the forest amid a flock, that Law unbared her “ beautiful bold brow,” and bade them all cower beneath the eye of reason. Human law arose from no human passion ; but from the necessity discerned by men, if they were to abide longer in this world, to have some voice above human passion, with power to control it.

That mighty instinct in the human heart which has ever spurned control by an individual brother, required absolutely to be commanded by a power not individual, which could dare to compel submission. With the very idea of law is bound up restraint of the individual ; the very object of law is the counteraction of passion ; if any two ideas are precisely antithetic, they are these two, law and passion.

Let us, leaving the others, look for a moment at this particular passion of revenge. When was it ever felt, save for personal wrongs, to such an extent that it could supply the place of an independent, disinterested voice ? When was it felt for sin, either against God or man, with half the intensity with which it has burned for the most insignificant personal injury ? When was its power ever permitted to remain comparatively unchecked, without producing effects of excess which were the mockery of justice ? Revenge was in the eye of Cain when he struck down Abel ; revenge was the Themis of the deadly feud demanding the unintermittent stream of blood from generation to generation for the accident or the mistake ; but when revenge ever spoke, save perhaps in the convulsions and spasms of national life, with the voice of reason, cannot be discovered. Of all the passions on which Law cast her quelling eye, blind, selfish, murderous revenge was perhaps the most turbulent and unreasonable.

We are led to this conclusion :—That man, feeling in his bosom a freedom which, like the very breath of the Almighty, was part of his essential existence, yet saw himself so encumbered by manifold imperfections, so preyed upon by individual passions, that, in his progress onwards, he was compelled, unconsciously, or by a voice from heaven, to originate the thing society, and to establish a power which, personating the community, should visit with punishment crimes committed against it : this last power was Law. It has been said that it had its root in expediency ; but the sense in which this holds good is important. It was expedient with reference to eternity. As mankind navigated the stream of time, a fatal mutiny broke out, and the expedient of law became necessary to make existence possible ; in a perfect state of humanity it were impossible ; it will vanish when society vanishes, in the restored state of man. But it may, nevertheless, appeal to eternal laws ; nay, it may be specially said to rise over the clamour of individual and temporal interests, and endeavour to catch the eternal accents of justice ; its commission is temporal, its code is eternal.

Law is the antithesis of individualism. But if we did seek its analogue in the individual mind, we should not look for it in revenge : we should find it in the serene pause of reason, when all noises from without are excluded, and the raving passions are stilled within, and the soul asks counsel of pure truth and perfect justice.

Does not the universal opinion of mankind, in its unconscious expression, during all ages, vindicate this view of law? If not, whence is it that Justice has ever been figured as of calm, passionless countenance; no cloud of revenge, no gleam of pity on her brow, and holding in her hand the well-poised balance? Law does not regard men as such; it regards them as retarding forces which hinder men in their march through time; and, as such, visits them with punishment. Hatred, love, revenge, pity, every emotion which has reference to the living, sentient being, is foreign to that iron brow; there must be no quivering in the hand which holds that even balance.

But look again at that calm image of Justice, lifting her serene brow into the still azure. A poetic eye, regarding that figure in time, may see that it has ever been accompanied by two other figures. On the one hand was Revenge, with instruments of torture, and an eye where blended the fury of hell and the hunger of the grave. This Fury has ever called for more victims and more pain. That she has not cried in vain, let the groans that have come from earth's racks and wheels, earth's crosses and furnaces, bear sad witness. On the other hand was Love, pleading ever against Revenge, and endeavouring to draw an iron tear from the eye of Justice. Both these figures are foreign to the idea of Law. Revenge looks from the fault to the individual, and says, torture and kill him; Love looks from the fault to the individual, and says, pity and save him: Law regards the fault alone.

Revenge is thus shown to have, as was previously said, a function in time. Love might conceivably become morbid, might degenerate into a weak sentimentalism, might cease to accept the stern necessity of not sparing the sin, whatever might be the feeling entertained for the sinner. And had it not been for the positive pleasure of revenge, perhaps the sorrow entailed upon men, in the punishment of those among them who clog the wheels of progress, had caused its having never been proceeded with : so far, in strict psychological truth, does Mr Carlyle err when he speaks of the exercise of revenge being painful. Love may go farther than can be allowed it in the present condition of the human race ; and then revenge may feel itself crushed and unduly outraged, and call out for a new fixing of that medium between extremes, which is all we can yet attempt. Nay, it is quite beyond my intention to deny that this may, in individual instances, have been the case in the Philanthropic movement.

Love and revenge, considered thus in their relation to justice, are alike temporal. When men have re-attained their true, original, spiritual life, their work will have been completed ; Justice will then for ever rule, and alone ; but no longer over cowering, struggling, trembling creatures ; for, when we look up, the iron brow shall have become gold, and we shall know, by the fadeless smile on the lip, that to eternity Justice and Love are one.

Now are we fairly at the point where we can decide upon the claims of Philanthropy. Granting that love and revenge are each and equally foreign to the idea of law, let us put this question :—In a state of progress, in a state of advancement from worse to better, shall we proceed towards the enlargement of the province of love, or to that of the province of revenge ? Surely we may answer, without hesitation, that the advancement must be in the direction of love, and that, more and more, revenge will be driven away, as men attain to higher and higher development. When all passions fade away, their function being performed, love will also pass away, but only to become one with justice. We shall not hang such a curtain of murky darkness over the future of humanity, as to say that it is not towards love, but towards hatred, not towards mercy, but revenge, that we are advancing. Surely, if there is one instinct in the human heart which is entwined with its essential life, and which wings its proudest aspirations ; if there is one universal faith written in the brightness which, even in its tears, the eye of humanity gathers as it looks towards the far distance ; if there is one belief which pre-cminently stamps earth as the place of hope, it is this,—that, despite volcanoes and thunderstorms, despite scaffolds and battle-fields, despite death and the grave, love is, by eternal nature and essence, holier than hate, and will ultimately prevail against it. Whatever their present mission, revenge and hatred are known by men to belong to a state of disease ; to be in their nature, when between reasonable beings, not divine, but diabolic. Go to the poor Bedouin of the desert, and ask what is his idea of justice and of law. There, amid his burning wastes, where he clings on to the skirts of civilization, scarce able to count on his life for an hour to come, you find in full development the bare idea of force as what is to be feared, and obeyed, and worshipped. The foot that can crush him like a worm into the sand, the eye that will not relent for tears or groaning,—these he honours. Is not this the first rude idea of humanity ? Must we still learn from the desert wanderer ? Surely, at some point in the evolution of the ages, the soothing, softening, mighty influences of kindness were to begin to make themselves more distinctly felt than in the old iron times. It is a universal principle that, strength being secured, the milder any Government is, the nearer does it approach to perfection : this holds good of the heart, the family, and the nation. And however Philanthropy may as yet struggle amid obstruction and obscurity, shall we not hail it as a streak, coming beautifully, though as yet faintly and dubiously, over the mist-wreaths of morning, of that mild sunlight whose power will one day replace that of the tempest ? The time had come for Philanthropy ; and Howard was sent to call it into visible form and working. And, methinks, even although such a dreadful thing has happened as that one or two fewer strokes have been inflicted on the writhing criminal than fierce revenge, or even Bedouin justice, might demand, it is better to have it so, than that we should go back to the days of racks and wheels, of human beings distracted with sorrow, and guiltless creatures dying of jail fever. But this consideration is not required. The cause of Philanthropy rests immoveably on these simple truths : that there is a discernible and distinct office performed by pity in our present condition relating to justice ; and that its function must go on expanding if men advance. Philanthropy is a weapon from heaven's armoury ; the time ought to have come when we can use it ; if it has not, the greater our shame, not the worse the weapon.

Extremes are always easy ; this is as true as that they are always wrong. A maudlin, morbid pity, refusing the imperative conditions of our existence in time, is the one extreme ; for it no defence is here offered,—it is distinct from true Christian Philanthropy : a savage, unsparing, execrating denunciation of Philanthropy is the other, equally false, and still more easy extreme ; against it I here specially strive. The difficulty assuredly is to discover what is really valuable in Philanthropy, to separate it from dross, and to shape it into a tool for our work, or a weapon for our warfare.

We have hitherto contemplated love in its human aspect, and appealed merely to human reason and history. But it can in no quarter be deemed unimportant that an idea is approved by a religion, which, name it as you will, is the highest that ever appeared on earth, and has swayed more intellect than ever any other. Christianity sanctions and embodies Philanthropy. The angel that led the choir over the fields of Bethlehem was named Love. Take away love from Christianity, and you have taken away its life ; love, not alone to the just and the holy, but to the sinner ; to the pale Magdalene, to whom no one but the King of men and of angels will deign to speak, to the poor publican, and the hated leper, and the raving maniac. It was at the voice of Christianity that modern Philanthropy awoke, and it is in this alliance that it is to be regarded with hope. Christianity gives us those fundamental truths of Philanthropy, that sin can be hated and the sinner loved, and that love will be the end of all. Say not that this first is a filmy distinction, or that it will blunt the weapons, and unnerve the arms, that must carry on truceless war with evil. If it is a cloud, it is as one of those interposed by kind supernal powers between the breast of Greek or Trojan hero and the mortal stab : it alone shuts our hearts against hatred of our brothers. And think not the second charge valid : all human history is against you. Men have always fought and toiled best when moved by impulses holding of the infinite. It is the banner painted on the clouds under which men will conquer ; it was when, amid the battle-dust around Antioch, or coming along the slopes of Olivet, the worn crusader caught the gleam of celestial helms advancing to his rescue, that he became irresistible. The ill done us by a poor brother is a paltry motive ; who would not rather strain his sinews a little harder, have a few more hot drops on his own brow, than kill the poor creature whom we had got down ! We must have a motive in our war with evil that will be beyond the sounding and measuring of our own faculties. This Mr Carlyle knows well ; but he finds it in boundless wrath against the individual caitiff ; by looking beyond time altogether, we have found it in a necessity of nature and the command of God. Sin is an infinite evil ; against it we are to strive with unbounded indignation. To put it away from us, we must slay him who is fatally infected, and whose infection will spread ; but not towards him are we necessitated to entertain any feeling but love ; the whole fervour of our hate is against that snake whose deadly venom has utterly tainted his blood. It is by some mighty distraction in the order of things, by some staining of the "white radiance of eternity," by some disturbance of the everlasting rest, that sin has extended its influence to reasoning human beings. One great effect of this is, that, in time, and by man, the distinction between the sin and the reasoning human being it affects cannot be perfectly preserved. But the infinitude of God's peace will one day envelope the little stream of time, and hush all its frettings and foamings in the calm of its perfect light; and the religion whose aim and end is the attainment of this higher rest by man does most fitly, and with a sublime prominence, wear this distinction on its front. "Love thy neighbour as thyself," says Christianity: there is no exception. But does Christianity not bid us war against sin?

Retaining, with Sandy Mackay, the ancient belief in a positive living spirit of evil, I venture to believe also in sinless intelligences, superior, for the present at least, to men, and employed on hests of mercy by God. Wandering unseen among us in the performance of their ministries of love, they are untainted by the sin and untouched by the sorrow of earth. Now, can we conceive any way in which they could have been secured from mere earthly sorrow, from the poignancy of sheer ignoble grief,—that grief which is dependent for its origin on the state, and not on the circumstances, of the soul,—save by their distinguishing between the sin and the sinner, and being thus wrapped up in an impenetrable garment of celestial love? Safe in this, they can gaze upon the wandering mortal, however black his iniquity, with eyes wherein every gleam of indignation, every dark speck of hatred, every scowl of revenge, is drowned in the softest dew. God has sent them as messengers to a world of sin; but they bear with them the atmosphere of heaven, for within them is the glow, around them is the music, of love. And man is by Christianity exalted to a privilege like theirs. Like them, he shares in the universal battle ; like them, he wars to the death with sin : but, if he is a Christian, he is, like them, dowered with an exemption from every emotion that would taint the atmosphere of his own mind. All now said has been shown to be consistent with human instinct ; but if nature only points to the distinction between sin and the sinner, if, like a dumb animal, it merely by its pain indicates a want, Christianity brings out the truth in its clearness, and vindicates a superiority to nature. It is on the mount with Jesus that we enter the company of heavenly creatures.

And with full decision, while with earnest reverence, may we point to Christ Jesus himself as the perfect philanthropist. Let who will deny the compatibility of a Christian hatred of sin with a Christian love of the sinner ; let it appear to philosophers and to natural religionists chimerical or weak ; the Christian can always respond by merely pointing to Him as He appeared on that day when He looked over Jerusalem. Was there infinite hatred for sin in those words of doom ? Was there infinite love in those tears ? And, let who will jeer at the man or the woman who goes into the penitentiary, the prison, the condemned cell, with the Bible, to try to rescue for heaven those whom society must banish from earth : if nature calls that a vain or absurd task, Christianity speaks differently. To every objection—of hopelessness, of sentimentalism, of enthusiasm—the Christian can simply answer, There was once a thief to whom the gospel was preached in the mortal agony, and that night he walked with the Preacher in Paradise.

PART II.

ILLUSTRATIVE BIOGRAPHIES.

JOHN HOWARD.

THERE is no fair and adequate, in one word, satisfactory, biography of Howard in the hands of his countrymen,—no estimate of his character and work which can or ought to be final. Aiken's work is mainly a lengthened mental analysis, by no means void of value, and written with clearness and spirit ; but it admits of doubt whether Howard was of that order of men in whose case such analysis can be considered useful or admissible. Brown's life contains a true image of Howard ; but it rests there in rude outline, too much as the statue lies in the half-cut block. The work wants unity, is fatally dull, and is not free from the generic taints of biography, exaggeration and daubing. Mr Dixon's book is in some respects the best, and in some the worst I have seen on Howard. The account it gives of his journeys is spirited and clear, and no charge of dullness can be brought against its general style. Yet it may be pronounced, as a whole, and in one word, wrong. It is set on a false key. It is brisk, sparkling, continually pointed ; if it does not directly share the characteristics of either, it seems to belong to a debateable region between flippancy and bombast ; in fatal measure, it wants chasteness and repose. No man can be named in whose delineation these characteristics are so totally out of place, and these wants so plainly irreparable, as in that of Howard. The main attribute of his nature, the universal aspect of his life, was calmness : he ever reminds one of a solemn hymn, sung with no instrumental accompaniment, with little musical power, but with the earnest melody of the heart, in an old Hebrew household. Mr Dixon gives his readers a wrong idea of the man : more profoundly wrong than could have arisen from any single mistake,—and such, of a serious nature, there are in his work,—for it results from the whole tone and manner of the work. A Madonna, in the pure colour and somewhat rigid grace of Francia, stuck round with gumflowers by a Belgian populace ; a Greek statue described by a young American fine writer ;—such are the anomalies suggested by this Life of Howard. There were one or two memoirs published in magazines at the time of his death, but these are now quite unknown. On the whole, the right estimate and proper representation of the founder of Modern Philanthropy have still to be looked for. And at the present moment such are specially required. Since the publication of Mr Carlyle's pamphlets, opinion regarding him has been of one of two sorts : either it is thought that his true place has at length been fixed, that Mr Carlyle's sneers are reasonable ; or unmeasured and undistinguishing indignation has been felt against that writer, and the old rapturous applause of Howard has been prolonged. Neither view of the case is correct. To submit that applause to a calm examination, and discover wherein, and how far, it is and has been just ; to estimate the power of Mr Carlyle's attack, and determine in how far it settles the deserts of its object ; and to offer a brief, yet essentially adequate representation of the life of Howard in its wholeness : such is the attempt made in the following paragraphs.

John Howard was born in London, or its vicinity, about the year 1727 ; the precise locality and the precise date have been matter of dispute. His mother, of whom we have no information, died in his infancy. His father was a dealer in upholstery wares in London, and realized a considerable fortune. He had a character for parsimony. We are not, indeed, furnished with any instances of remarkable closeness or illiberality, and his conduct to his son affords no marks of such. That the allegation, however, had certain grounds in truth cannot be doubted ; and the circumstance is not a little singular in the father of one who must be allowed, whether with censure or applause, to have found, from the days of his boyhood, a keen delight in giving. But whatever the nature or force of this foible, the character of the elder Howard was, on the whole, worthy and substantial. He was a man of quiet, methodic habits, deeply imbued with religious sentiment ; his views were Calvinistic, and he was member of a denomination unconnected with the English establishment—probably the Independent. He was specially characterized by a rigid observance of the Sabbath. We find in him, indeed, unmistakeable traces of the devout earnestness of an earlier age ; and it admits of little doubt that his religion was a lingering ray of the light which burned so conspicuously in England in the preceding century. While the bacchanal rout of the Restoration made hideous the night of England's departed glory, there were a few, perhaps many, who retired into hidden places, to nurse on household altars the flame which seemed erewhile about to illumine the world ; and in the next century such could not have altogether died away. That deep godliness whose sacred influence, like a resting gleam of dewy light, was shed over the whole career of John Howard, accompanied him from his father's house. Were it not somewhat strange, if it proved to have been a dying ray of the old Puritanism which brightened into Modern Philanthropy !

The boy Howard made no figure in his classes. He was, beyond question, what is generally known as a dull boy. He never acquired a perfect grammatical knowledge, or a ready command, even of his native language. Yet he appears, in his early years, to have given indications of a character different from that of ordinary dull boys. His schoolfellows seem to have discerned him, despite his slowness, to possess qualities deserving honourable regard ; they saw that he was unobtrusive, self-respecting, unostentatiously but warmly generous. Price, doubtless one of the quickest of boys, and Howard, slow as he was, were drawn towards each other at school, and formed a friendship broken only by death. He succeeded also, and with no conscious effort, in inspiring his older friends and relatives with a sense of the general worth, the substantial, reliable value, of his character. He was known to be sedate, serious, discreet ; his word could be depended upon ; his sagacity was true ; above all, he was simple, quiet, modest.

It being manifest that he had no vocation to letters, his father very sensibly removed him from school, and bound him apprentice to Messrs Newnham & Shipley, grocers in the city of London. A premium of £700 was paid with him ; he was furnished with separate apartments, and a couple of saddle-horses. There is no mark of parsimony here.

In 1742, his father died, leaving him heir to considerable property, and seven thousand pounds in money. By the provisions of the will, he was not to enter on his inheritance ere reaching his twenty-fourth year. But his guardians permitted him at once to undertake the principal management of his affairs. As he was still a mere boy, seventeen or eighteen at most, this must be regarded as a decisive proof of the high estimation in which he was held by those who had been in a position to form an estimate of his character. He speedily quitted the establishment in the city ; his apprenticeship was never completed.

Not long after his father's death, he travelled for some time on the Continent, and, on his return, went into lodgings at Stoke-Newington. Here he continued for several years. His existence was quiet, even, in no way remarkable, broken only by visits to the west of England on account of his health. This last was quite unsettled. It is indeed to be borne in mind, in the contemplation of his whole career, that he had to sustain a life-long struggle with ill health, that all the influences, to sour the temper, to close the heart, to dim the intellect, to enfeeble the will, which are included in that one word, bore perpetually on Howard. His constitution was by no means sound, and had a strong determination towards consumption. In his unnoticed retirement at Stoke-Newington it is easy to picture him ; his pale, tranquil countenance, marked, perhaps, with somewhat of the weary and oppressed look that comes of constant acquaintance with weakness and pain, but unclouded by any repining, and mildly lighted by modest self-respect, by inborn kindness, by deep, habitual piety. He derived some pleasure from a slight intermeddling with certain of the simplest parts of natural philosophy and medical science : of the latter he seems to have obtained a somewhat considerable knowledge.

This quiet existence was, after a time, rather interestingly and unexpectedly enlivened. Howard, in one set of apartments which he occupied, met with less attention than he deemed his due ; probably it was thought his mild nature could be imposed upon with impunity : he quitted the place. Entering lodgings kept by a widow named Loidore, he found himself waited upon to his absolute satisfaction. In his new abode illness overtook him, or rather his perpetual ill health reached a crisis. Mrs Loidore tended him with all possible kindness ; and the result on his part was not only gratitude, but, as we believe, sincere attachment. On his recovery, he offered her his hand. She was above fifty ; he was now about twenty-five. Her health, too, was delicate ; but Howard was resolute, and, after of course objecting, she of course consented. The circumstance indicates Howard's extreme simplicity of nature, and power to do, in the face of talk and laughter, what he thought right and desirable : it may also be regarded as one proof among many of a naturally affectionate nature : it reveals nothing further.

For two or three years, the married pair resided at Stoke-Newington, much in the same manner, we presume, as formerly. Howard had a real, though by no means ardent, affection for his wife ; it was a sincere affliction he experienced when, after the above period, she died.

Such was the youthful period of Howard's life. The extent of information which the few incidents it embraces affords us regarding him may be summed up by saying, that they show him to have been methodic, gentle, and, above all, considerately kind. He seems never to have allowed the pleasure of making a fellow-creature happier to have escaped him.

He was now about twenty-eight years of age. Unbound by any tie to England, he determined again to travel. The excitement arising from the occurrence of the great earthquake at Lisbon was still fresh, and he was attracted to Portugal. He sailed for Lisbon, in a vessel called the Hanover. His voyage, however, was not destined to have a peaceful termination ; and the circumstances into which he was about to be thrown exercised a perceptible influence on his future career. The ship was taken by a French privateer ; Howard was made prisoner. The treatment he met with was inhuman. For forty hours he was kept with the other prisoners on board the French vessel, without water, and with "hardly a morsel of food." They were then carried into Brest, and committed to the castle. They were flung into a dungeon ; and, after a further period of starvation, "a joint of mutton was at length thrown into the midst of them, which, for want of the accommodation of so much as a solitary knife, they were obliged to tear to pieces, and gnaw like dogs." There was nothing in the dungeon to sleep on, except some straw ; and in such a place, and with such treatment, Howard and his fellow-prisoners remained for nearly a week. He was then removed to Carpaix, and afterwards to Morlaix, where he impressed his jailer with such a favourable opinion of his character, that he was permitted to enjoy an amount of liberty not usually accorded to prisoners in his situation.

At Morlaix Howard had inducement and apology enough for remaining idle, or, at least, for occupying himself solely in negotiations for his own release, and in gathering up his strength after his hardships. But he did not remain idle, nor did he abandon himself to the above occupations. The sufferings he had witnessed while inmate of a French prison would not let him rest. He had seen something amiss, something unjust, something which pained his heart as a feeling man ; his English instinct of order and of work was outraged ; there was something to be done ; and he set himself to do it. He collected information respecting the state of English prisoners of war in France. He found that his own treatment was part, and nowise a remarkable part, of a system ; that many hundreds of these prisoners had perished through sheer ill usage ; and that thirty-six had been buried in a hole at Dinan in one day. In fact, he discovered that he had come upon an abomination and iniquity on the face of the earth, which, strangely enough, had been permitted to go on unheeded until it had reached this frightful excess. He learned its extent, and departed with his information for England. He was permitted to cross the Channel, on pledging his word to return, if a French officer was not exchanged for him. He secured his own liberation, and at once set to work on behalf of his oppressed countrymen. His representations were effectual. Those prisoners of war who were confined in the three prisons which had been the principal scene of the mischief, returned to England in the first cartel ships that arrived. Howard modestly remarks, that perhaps his sufferings on this occasion increased his sympathy with the inhabitants of prisons. There is not much to be said of these simple and unimposing circumstances. They merely show that he, on coming into a position to do a piece of work, did it at once and thoroughly; that his feelings were not of the sentimental sort, which issue in tears or words, but of the substantial and silent sort, which issue in deeds; that what had doubtless been seen by many a dapper officer, and perhaps by prisoners not military, in full health and with ample leisure, had not been righted until seen by Howard, sickly and slow of speech. It was nothing great or wonderful that he did : in the circumstances, nine out of ten would have done nothing at all. He was thanked by the commissioners for the relief of sick and wounded seamen ; but his real reward was the intense pleasure with which he must have hailed the arrival of those cartel ships, and felt that at least so much of iniquity and cruelty was ended. For the first time in his life, dull Howard was at the top of his class.

Abandoning, for the present, all thoughts of foreign travel, Howard now retired to Bedfordshire, where he possessed an estate. It was situated at the village of Cardington, and had been the scene of his childhood : it was his principal residence during life. We come to contemplate him in what he himself declared to have been the only period of his life in which he enjoyed real pleasure. Though quiet and unobserved, that pleasure was indeed real and deep.

He had reached the prime of life ; his years were about thirty. His character, in its main features, was matured. He was quiet, circumspect, considerate ; he knew himself, and was guarded by a noble modesty from obtruding into any sphere for which he was not fitted by nature ; the groundwork of his character was laid in method, kindness, and deep, unquestioning godliness. The time had arrived when he was to experience a profound and well-placed affection, and to have it amply returned. Henrietta Leeds was the daughter of Edward Leeds of Croxton, in Cambridgeshire : she was about the same age with Howard, and seemed formed by nature precisely for his wife. She resembled him in deep and simple piety. She had drawn up a covenant in which she consigned herself, for time and eternity, to her Father in heaven, and signed it with her own hand. She resembled him in general simplicity of nature : she had no taste or liking for aught beyond what was plain and neat. Most of all, she resembled him in kindness of disposition : the bestowal of happiness was the source of her keenest joy. Her features were regular ; their expression mild, somewhat pensive, and not without intelligence : a little gilding from love might make her face seem beautiful. Where she and Howard first met does not appear ; but meet they did, and thought it might be advisable to make arrangements to obviate the necessity of future parting. His love was in no sense rapturous. It was sincere and deep, but characteristic : it retained, at a period when such is usually dispensed with, the noble human faculty of looking before and after. Love has a thousand modes and forms, all of which may be consistent with reality and truth. It may come like the burst of morning light, kindling the whole soul into new life and radiance ; it may grow, inaudibly and unknown, until its roots are found to be through and through the heart, entwined with its every fibre : it is unreal and false only when it is a name for some form of selfishness. Howard's was a quiet, earnest, undemonstrative affection. He was drawn by a thousand sympathies to Harriet ; never did nature say more clearly to man, that here was the one who had been created to be his helpmeet : he heard nature's voice, and loved. But he was quite calm. He even looked over the wall of the future into the paradise which he was to enter, and remarked the possibility of difference arising between the happy pair whom he saw walking in the distance. Accordingly, he went to Harriet, and proposed a stipulation that, in case of diversity of opinion, his voice should be decisive. Harriet assented. They were married in 1758, and took up their residence at Cardington. Here, with the exception of a few years spent at a small property which Howard purchased in Hampshire, they continued until the death of Mrs Howard.

One is tempted to linger for a brief space on the sole pleasant spot in Howard's earthly journey. Ere he met Harriet, he had turned to the right hand and to the left, scarce knowing or caring whither he went, and dogged always by pain. Not long after her death, he heard the call which made him a name for ever, and which bade him leave the wells and the palm-trees of rest, to take his road along the burning sand of duty. Not only may the spectacle of a truly happy English home be pleasing, but we may gather from the prospect certain hints touching the actual nature and precise value of Howard's character.

The pleasures of the new pair were somewhat varied. The embellishment of the house and grounds went so far. This was a business of particular interest with Howard. He built additions to his house, and laid out three acres in pleasure-grounds, erecting an arbour, and cutting and planting according to his simple taste; the approving smile of Harriet always sped the work. A visit to London was proposed and carried into effect; but the enjoyment obtained was nowise great, for neither was adapted for town life, and Harriet in particular longed for the green fields. Natural philosophy, in a very small way, was put under contribution. Then there was occasional visiting and entertaining of the country gentlemen of Bedfordshire. Howard always exercised a warm and dignified hospitality, and, though remarkably abstemious himself, kept ever a good table and excellent wines for his guests. But of all the joys of this Bedfordshire home, by far the principal arose out of the fact that Howard and his wife were both "by nature admirers of happy human faces." Around Cardington there was soon drawn a circle of such ; gradually widening, still brightening, and, by nature's happy law, ever shedding a stronger radiance of reflected joy on the centre whence their own gladness came. Shortly after the marriage, we find Harriet disposing of certain jewels, and putting the price into what they called the charity-purse ; its contents went to procure this crowning luxury, happy human faces. Since this pleasure may be supposed to interest us more than any of the others, it is worth while to inquire how the money was disposed of.

The village of Cardington had been the abode of poverty and wretchedness. Its situation was low and marshy ; the inhabitants were unhealthy ; ague, that haunts the fen and cowers under the mantle of the mist, especially abounded. Altogether, this little English village had the discontented, uneasy look of a sick child. And the intellectual state of its people corresponded to their physical ; no effort had been made to impart to them aught of instruction. Part of this village was on the estate of John Howard. Unnoticed by any, and not deeming himself noteworthy, but having in his bosom a true, kind heart, and loyally anxious to approve himself to his God, he came to reside upon it with his wife. No bright talents were his ; and his partner was a simple creature, of mild womanly ways, made to love rather than to think. Yet the fact was, account for it as you will, that, year by year, the village of Cardington showed a brighter face to the morning sun ; year by year, the number of damp, unwholesome cottages grew less ; year by year, you might see new and different cottages spring up, little kitchen-gardens behind, little flower-gardens before, neat pailings fronting the road, roses and creepers looking in at the windows, well-washed, strong-lunged, sunny-faced children frolicking round the doors. These cottages were so placed that they could see the sunlight ; the mist and the ague were driven back. Their inhabitants paid an easy rent, sent their children to school, were a contented, orderly, sober people. Cardington became "one of the neatest villages in the kingdom." If you asked one of the villagers to what or whom it owed all this, the answer would have been—John Howard.

Kind-hearted, conscientious, shrewd, and accurate, he had lost no time in acquainting himself with the evils with which he had to contend, and addressing himself to the contest. The damp, unhealthy cottages on his own estate were by degrees removed, and such as we have described built in their stead ; those not on his own estate, requiring a similar treatment, were purchased. He let the new cottages at an advantageous rate, annexing certain conditions to their occupancy. He became the centre of quite a patriarchal system. His tenants were, to a certain extent, under his authority ; they were removable at will, they were bound over to sobriety and industry, they were required to abstain from such amusements as he deemed of immoral tendency, and attendance at public worship was enjoined. Besides the customary ordinances, there was Divine service in a cottage set apart for the purpose, the villagers, we are told, gladly availing themselves of the additional opportunity. Schools also were established, not in Cardington alone, but in the neighbouring hamlets. He ruled a little realm of his own ; a realm which, in the eighteenth century, was very favourably distinguished from the surrounding regions ; an unmarked patriarchal domain, whose government was, on the whole, beneficent.

When we contemplate the phenomenon of Howard's influence at Cardington, do we not experience a strong impulse to question the fact of his having been, even intellectually, the ordinary, unoriginal man he has been called ? It is fair to recollect that he was of that class which, perhaps pre-eminently, does nothing ; of that class whose epitaph Mr Carlyle has written in Sartor Resartus. His task was not perhaps very difficult ; but just think of the effect, if every English landlord performed his duty so conscientiously and so well. A biographer of Howard, writing when the present century was well advanced, has recorded that Cardington still retained, among English villages, a look of "order, neatness, and regularity." If mere common sense did this, it was common sense under some new motive and guidance ; we can only regret that it so rarely follows the higher light of godliness. And if Howard's claim to positive applause is slight, what are we to say of his exculpation from the positive sin which, during that century, accumulated so fearfully on the head of certain classes and corporations in England ? Different had been the prospect now, had England, in that century, been covered with such schools as Howard's. Surely one may ask, without arrogance, why did not the Church of England accomplish at least so much then ?

In his own household, there reigned calmness and cheerful content. The whole air and aspect of the place was such as might have suggested that perfect little picture by Ten-nyson,—

" An English home—grey twilight pour'd
On dewy pastures, dewy trees,
Softer than sleep—all things in order stored,
A haunt of ancient Peace."

He lived much in the consideration of Old Testament times and worthies, shaping his life after that of the Hebrew Patriarchs. His Bible was to him a treasury of truth, which he never even dreamed exhaustible. As he looked over the brightening scene of his humble endeavours, and the pleasant bowers around his own dwelling, and felt all his tranquil joy represented and consummated in his Harriet, we may imagine those words breathing through his heart—"I will be as the dew unto Israel:" as the dew, stealing noiselessly down in an evening stillness, unseen by any eye, yet refreshing the very heart of nature. Harriet, with all her simplicity, was a perfect wife; she could hear the beating of her husband's heart. Once there was somewhat over from the yearly expenditure. Howard, thinking his wife might derive enjoyment from a trip, proposed that they should spend it in a visit to London. Harriet looked quietly into his eyes, and answered, "What a pretty cottage it would build!" Conceive the smile of silent unspeakable satisfaction, of deep unbounded love, that would spread over the placid features of Howard as he heard these words.

The part taken by the kind and gentle Harriet in the dissemination of blessing over Howard's neighbourhood was no-wise unimportant. In the hour of sickness and distress, she was to be seen by the bed or the fireside, supplying little wants, whispering words of consolation. She made it also a peculiar part of her duty to see that the female portion of the community was employed, and to supply them with work when threatened with destitution.

Thus was Howard, cheered and assisted by his wife, an unassuming, godly English landlord, doing his work, and never imagining that he was a profitable servant. His tenantry, and specially his domestics, loved him; although, as we are happy to find, since it is an almost conclusive, and certainly indispensable proof of decision and discrimination, there was not a complete absence of murmuring and insinuation against him in the village. He engaged in constant and intimate converse with his dependants, interesting himself in their affairs, and giving little pieces of advice. He might be seen entering their cottages, and sitting down to chat and eat an apple. We can figure him, too, as he walked along the road, stopping the children he met, giving each of them a half-penny, and imparting the valuable and comprehensive advice, to “ be good children, and wash their hands and faces.” Can we not discern, as he utters the words, a still smile of peace and satisfaction on his really noble English countenance? There was no sign of creative power in his eye; there were no lines of deep thought on his brow; but decision, and shrewdness, and intense though governed kindness, were written on that face. Above all, it was cloudless in its clearness. It was the calm, open countenance of a man who could look the whole world in the face, which was darkened by no stain of guile, or guilt, or self-contempt, and on which, through habitual looking upwards, there was a glow of the mild light of heaven. Nor was it destitute of a certain reposeing strength, a look of complete self-knowledge and self-mastery, gently shaded, as it was, by a deep but manly humanity, which told again of the bended knee and the secret walk with God. When we look at Howard’s portrait, we cease to wonder that his face was always received as an unquestionable pledge of perfect honour and substantial character.

There was one drop by which the cup of happiness in the home at Cardington might still have been augmented. Howard and his wife had no child. Harriet seems to have been peculiarly adapted to perform the duties of a mother: so gentle, so full of quiet sense, so well able to read a want ere it reached the tongue. At length, after seven years of married life, on Wednesday, the 27th of March 1765, she had a son. On the ensuing Sabbath, Howard went to church as usual; all seemed to be going well. After his return she was suddenly taken ill, and died in his arms. She had just seen her boy, just felt the unuttered happiness of a new love, just discerned that a fresh brightness rested on the face of the world, and then she had to close her eyes, and lie down in the silent grave.

Howard's feelings, it is scarce requisite to say, were not of the sort which commonly reach the surface. There was nothing sudden or impulsive in his nature; his very kindness and affection were ever so tempered, ever rendered so equable, by consideration, that they might at times wear the mask of austerity. But the sorrow he felt for his Harriet reached the innermost deeps of his soul. A light had passed from the "revolving year;" the flowers which Love may strew in the path of the "stern daughter of the voice of God"—for Duty herself strews no flowers—had withered away; until he again clasped the hand of Harriet, his enjoyment had ceased. He laid her in her grave, and a simple tablet in Cardington Church told the simple truth, that she had "opened her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue was the law of kindness." A good many years afterwards, on the eve of a departure for the Continent, from which he might never return, Howard was walking with his son in his grounds, and mentioning some improvements which he had contemplated:—"These, however, Jack," he said, "in case I should not come back, you will pursue or not as you may think proper; but remember, this walk was planted by your mother; and if ever you touch a twig of it, may blessing never rest upon you!"

His infant son was now all that was left on earth to Howard. He loved him with the whole force of his nature. Two strong feelings, having reference to this earth, and two alone, were, in the years of his long journeyings, to be found in his bosom: the one was the memory of Harriet, the other the love of his boy.

But it is not unimportant to a perfect comprehension of the character of Howard to know that there was, in his general deportment as husband and father, a gravity, decision, and authority, which wore the aspect of austereness. The founder of philanthropy was as free as ever man from any form of sentimentalism ; it was for real affliction, for substantial pain, he felt and acted ; a tender, winning, soothing manner was never his. Whatever may be said of modern philanthropists, he certainly was not one whose feelings carried him away, who saw distress and injustice, and, bursting into tears, rushed, half-blinded with his sympathy, to make bad worse. He has been spoken of by some as if he resembled one who, perceiving a child drowning in a reservoir, and being moved to pity by its cries, casts down an embankment to save it, and floods a country. He was no such man. Since the world began, until he appeared, no one had done so much for the relief of distress, simply as such ; and yet it is probable that few men have lived who could look upon pain with calmer countenance than he. Nineteen men in twenty would have been weeping, and either blundering or leaving the distress alone ; Howard remained quite cool, looked at it, measured it, mastered it.

For about a year after the death of his wife, he continued to reside at Cardington. Towards the end of the year 1766 he visited Bath ; ill health had again, in new extremity, returned upon him. In the spring of the following year he travelled to Holland, and, quickly returning home, remained at Cardington until it was time to send his son to school. In the interval, nothing worthy of notice occurred ; he pursued his old plans for the improvement of his neighbourhood, deriving his principal comfort from his boy.

At length it became proper to send his son to school ; and Howard prepared again to visit the Continent. Cardington had become sad to him. He in great measure broke up his establishment there, providing, with considerate kindness, for his domestics ; these, as has been elsewhere remarked, loved him with an affection worthy of the servants of an old patriarch. He departed in the autumn of 1769 ; his intention was to visit the south of Italy, and probably remain there for the winter : he went by Calais, the south of France, and Geneva.

We arrive now at the most important epoch in Howard's life. The reader has been informed of the pervasion, from a period too early to be precisely fixed, of his whole character by godliness ; and we saw how the fact influenced his benevolent exertions in Bedfordshire. We have not yet however looked, so to speak, into the heart of Howard's religion ; we have only noted it incidentally, and from afar. It is necessary to view it more closely ; it will be of great importance to ascertain the weight and nature of its influence. His spiritual life now reached a crisis, which determined, in certain important respects, his future character and career.

Howard had intentions of spending the winter of 1769-70 either in the south of Italy or in Geneva. On arriving at Turin he abandoned the project. He had been pondering seriously the object and nature of his journey. He accused himself of mis-spending the "talent" committed to him, of gratifying a mere curiosity with those pecuniary means which might be turned in some way to God's glory, and which were necessarily withdrawn from works of mercy ; he thought of the loss of so many English Sabbaths ; he thought of "a retrospective view on a death-bed ;" he thought also of "distance from his dear boy." He determined to return. He concludes the memorandum from which these facts are gathered in the following words :*—"Look forward, oh my soul ! How low, how mean, how little, is everything but what has a view to that glorious world of light, life, and love. The preparation of the heart is of God. Prepare the heart, oh God ! of thy unworthy creature, and unto Thee be all the glory, through the boundless ages of eternity."

* Howard did not write English grammatically ; the spelling and punctuation are therefore altered.

"This night my trembling soul almost longs to take its flight to see and know the wonders of redeeming love,—join the triumphant choir ; sin and sorrow fled away, God, my Redeemer, all in all. Oh ! happy spirits that are safe in those mansions."

He turned homewards, and in February 1770 was at the Hague. We have here a further record of his spiritual life.

"Hague, Sunday Evening, February 11.

"I would record the goodness of God to the unworthiest of his creatures : for some days past a habitual serious frame, relenting for my sin and folly, applying to the blood of Jesus Christ, solemnly surrendering myself and babe to Him, begging the conduct of his Holy Spirit ; I hope, a more tender conscience," evinced "by a greater fear of offending God, a temper more abstracted from this world, more resigned to death or life, thirsting for union and communion with God, as my Lord and my God. Oh ! the wonders of redeeming love ! Some faint hope," that "even I ! through redeeming mercy in the perfect righteousness, the full atoning sacrifice, shall ere long be made the monument of the rich, free grace and mercy of God, through the Divine Redeemer. Oh, shout my soul ! Grace, grace, free, sovereign, rich and unbounded grace ! Not I, not I, an ill-deserving, hell-deserving creature ! But, where sin has abounded, I trust grace superabounds. Some hope !—what joy in that hope !—that nothing shall separate my soul from the love of God in Christ Jesus ; and, my soul, as such a frame is thy delight, pray frequently and fervently to the Father of spirits, to bless His word and your retired moments to your serious conduct in life.

"Let not, my soul, the interests of a moment engross thy thoughts, or be preferred to my eternal interests. Look forward to that glory which will be revealed to those who are faithful to death. My soul, walk thou with God ; be faithful ; hold on, hold out ; and then,—what words can utter !

I anxiously desire to avoid presumption here, and would leave every reader to his own judgment and conclusion in the matter ; but I think the workings of Howard's mind through this portion of his history may be traced.

It appears that, on leaving Cardington, his mind had engaged in deep reflection. His boy had gone away from him ; his Harriet was sleeping silently, her tender ways to cheer him no more ; he looked over his past life, from which the last rays of joy's sunlight were departing ; he looked forward to an old age, embittered by perpetual ill health. His mind awoke, in the discipline of sorrow, to a deeper earnestness. He felt, with sterner realization than heretofore, that the world was a desert, and time a dream ; with a new and tremendous energy his soul rose towards the eternal kingdoms. He looked with earnest scrutiny within, he closed his eye more to all around, and gazed upwards from his knees for the smiling of one countenance upon him. The intensity of his feelings would not comport with the prosecution of his journey to Italy. He mused upon it in the strain that has been indicated. He concluded that it was his duty to return home ; in a state of mind not a little agitated, he proceeded in the direction of England. He did not, however, proceed further for the present than the Hague. His mind appears here to have become calmer ; the second of the extracts just given reveals an almost rapturous frame of spirit. It is a detail of God's goodness towards him ; and, let it be remarked, that this goodness consists in work wrought in him, in his closer approximation to the requirements of God's law. The man who can feel ecstatic joy for that, and give God all the glory, has nothing higher to attain to in this world ; and on him no essential change will be wrought by passing through the gates of heaven.

He again turned southwards. At Lyons he writes thus :

“ Lyons, April 4, 1770.

“ Repeated instances of the unwearied mercy and goodness of God : preserved hitherto in health and safety ! Blessed be the name of the Lord ! Endeavour, oh my soul ! to cultivate and maintain a thankful, serious, humble, and resigned frame and temper of mind. May it be thy chief desire that the honour of God, the spread of the Redeemer’s name and gospel, may be promoted. Oh, consider the everlasting worth of spiritual and Divine enjoyments ; then thou wilt see the vanity and nothingness of worldly pleasures. Remember, oh my soul ! St Paul, who was determined to know nothing in comparison of Jesus Christ, and Him crucified. A tenderness of conscience I would ever cultivate ; no step would I take without acknowledging God. I hope my present journey, though again into Italy, is no way wrong, rejoicing if in any respect I could bring the least improvement that might be of use to my own country. But, oh my soul ! stand in awe, and sin not ; daily, fervently pray for restraining grace ; remember, if thou desirest the death of the righteous, and thy latter end like his, thy life must be so also. In a little while thy course will be run, thy sands finished ; a parting farewell with my ever dear boy, and then, oh my soul ! be weighed in the balance,—wanting, wanting ! but oh, the glorious hope of an interest in the blood and righteousness of my Redeemer and my God ! In the most solemn manner I commit my spirit into thy hand, oh Lord God of my salvation !

The last quotation which it is necessary to make is one of very great importance. It commences with a slight retrospect and self-examination ; it passes into a deliberate dedication of himself and his all to God :—

“ Naples, May 27, 1770.

“ When I left Italy last year, it then appeared most prudent and proper ; my return, I hope, is under the best direction, not presumptuous, being left to the folly of a foolish heart. Not having the strongest spirits or constitution, my continuing long in Holland or any place lowers my spirits ; so I thought returning would be no uneasiness on the review, as sinful and vain diversions are not my object, but the honour and glory of God my highest ambition. Did I now see it wrong by being the cause of pride, I would go back ; but being deeply sensible it is the presence of God that makes the happiness of every place, so, oh my soul ! keep close to Him in the amiable light of redeeming love ; and, amidst the snares thou art particularly exposed to in a country of such wickedness and folly, stand thou in awe, and sin not. Commune with thine own heart ; see what progress thou makest in thy religious journey ! Art thou nearer the heavenly Canaan,—the vital flame burning clearer and clearer ? or are the concerns of a moment engrossing thy foolish heart ? Stop ; remember thou art a candidate for eternity : daily, fervently pray for wisdom ; lift up your eyes to the Rock of Ages, and then look down on the glory of this world. A little while, and thy journey will be ended ; be thou faithful unto death. Duty is thine, though the power is God’s ; pray to Him to give thee a heart to hate sin more, uniting thy heart in his fear. Oh, magnify the Lord, my soul ; and, my spirit, rejoice in God my Saviour ! His free grace, unbounded mercy, love unparalleled, goodness unlimited. And oh, this mercy, this love, this goodness, exerted for me ! Lord God, why me ? When I consider, and look into my heart, I doubt, I tremble. Such a vile creature ; sin, folly, and imperfection in every action ! Oh, dreadful thought !—a body of sin and death

I carry about me, ever ready to depart from God ; and with all the dreadful catalogue of sins committed, my heart faints within me, and almost despairs. But yet, oh my soul ! why art thou cast down ?—why art thou disquieted ? Hope in God ! His free grace in Jesus Christ ! Lord, I believe ; help my unbelief. Shall I limit the grace of God ? Can I fathom His goodness ? Here, on His sacred day, I, once more in the dust before the Eternal God, acknowledge my sins heinous and aggravated in His sight. I would have the deepest sorrow and contrition of heart, and cast my guilty and polluted soul on thy sovereign mercy in the Redeemer. Oh, compassionate and divine Redeemer, save me from the dreadful guilt and power of sin, and accept of my solemn, free, and, I trust, unreserved, full surrender of my soul, my spirit, my dear child, all I am and have, into thy hands ! Unworthy of thy acceptance ! Yet, oh Lord God of mercy ! spurn me not from thy presence ; accept of me, vile as I am,—I hope a repenting, returning prodigal. I glory in my choice, acknowledge my obligations as a servant of the Most High God ; and now, may the Eternal God be my refuge, and thou, my soul, faithful to that God that will never leave nor forsake thee !

“ Thus, oh my Lord and my God ! is humbly bold, even a worm, to covenant with Thee. Do Thou ratify and confirm it, and make me the everlasting monument of Thy unbounded mercy. Amen, amen, amen. Glory to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, for ever and ever, amen !

“ Hoping my heart deceives me not, and trusting in His mercy for restraining and preventing grace, though rejoicing in returning what I have received of Him into his hands, yet with fear and trembling, I sign my unworthy name,

Howard was not a man who found any special delight in using his pen : the deep modesty of his nature, the deficiency of his education, his consequent want of affluence in expression, and the whole structure of his character as universally recognised, put this beyond dispute. It was only when his heart was very full, and the emotions with which it burned were as mounting lava, that they overflowed through that channel. The expressions quoted may be confidently regarded as pulses of his spiritual life, proceeding as truly from the centre of his spiritual nature as the blood which at fever heat might gush from his heart, the centre of his physical frame. And consider the earnestness, the stammering, gasping intensity, with which they start ruggedly forth ; mark the awe-struck humility with which he bows down before the Infinite God, and, as it were, the mute amazement of gratitude which, when the smile of God falls out of heaven upon his head, forces him to exclaim, "Lord God, why me?" Surely this last is a remarkable passage of feeling. Will it not be with such an emotion that the redeemed of God, when the eternal inheritance, so far surpassing expectation and desert, at last and suddenly bursts upon their sight, will shrink from asserting their right, and exclaim, "Lord, when did we merit this?" Observe, finally, here, respecting Howard, the completeness of the result,—the unwavering, unexcepting abdication of the throne of the soul to God. This formed the conclusion of that crisis in his spiritual history to which reference has been made.

One other remark must be made respecting these documents. In those awful moments, when Howard was alone with God, and his eyes, looking to the Rock of Ages, were so solemnly raised above every concern of time, there was one earthly visitant that entered the secret places of his heart ; that visitant was his boy.

The time was now near when Howard was to find his peculiar work. It may be said, though with reverence and hesitation, that he was specially fitted for it by God. Implanted by nature in his bosom, he exhibited from his earliest years a deep and a notably cosmopolitan compassion for the afflicted as such. In early years his nature was stilled, hallowed, and strengthened by religious principle. As he advanced in years, the great truths of Calvinism, or rather that one great truth of Calvinism, The Lord reigneth,—the Lord, just, sovereign, incomprehensible, in whose presence no finite being can speak,—formed a basis, as it were of adamant, for his whole character. He was sorely tried by physical ailments ; and, at the risk of his life, was compelled to pursue rigidly abstemious habits, being thus also debarred from all the pleasures of the great world. He was brought soon into actual experience of the distresses suffered by the inhabitants of prisons, and his first piece of positive work in the world was the relief of such. His character was next matured, confirmed, and mellowed, in the soft summer light of a quiet English home, where he loved and was loved by a true wife ; and where, in such tasks as we have seen, a mild apprenticeship was served to thoroughness and accuracy. He was then suddenly and awfully struck with affliction ; she who was so very beautiful in his eyes,—

was taken away from him. And then, after a little time, came that crisis in his spiritual history which his own words so vividly delineate. Whatever were his natural abilities, he awoke from that crisis with a moral strength which no force of temptation could overcome, and a calm dauntlessness which nothing earthly could turn aside. Then he found his work.

Howard's history thus seems to suggest the idea that God intended by him to bring prominently before the world some truth not hitherto duly regarded, to accomplish some work not hitherto adequately done : that the time had arrived when some gospel—shall we call it the gospel of love ?—was to be more specially and explicitly unfolded than it had been heretofore. With deliberate and immoveable faith, he himself entertained this belief, and has put it on record in humble yet sublime words, written when it was well-nigh finished :—

“I am not at all angry with the reflections that some persons make, as they think to my disparagement, because all they say of this kind gives God the greater honour ; in whose Almighty hand no instrument is weak, in whose presence no flesh must glory ; but the whole conduct of this matter must be ascribed to Providence alone, and God by me intimates to the world, however weak and unworthy I am, that He espouses the cause,* and to Him, to Him alone, be all the praise.”

Returning from the Continent, Howard remained for a certain period at Cardington : we hear of nothing remarkable in his life for some time. The state of his health in 1772 rendered it advisable to make a tour in the Channel Islands ; but he speedily returned to Bedfordshire. Here, in 1773, he was called to the office of sheriff of the county. He considered it his duty to comply with the invitation. Prudence might have whispered another decision. He was a Dissenter, and by becoming sheriff incurred the liability of very severe penalties. His danger might not be very great ; but it was real. He was not without enemies ; and his act put it in the power of any one of them, with profit to himself, to inflict very serious injury on him. It is, besides, the part of prudence to guard against possibilities : there was at least the possibility that he might suffer. Howard, however, with all his calmness, was too brave to be distinctively prudent. It might astonish some to find this among his adopted maxims,—“A fearless temper and an open heart are seldom strictly allied to prudence.” It is the maxim of a truly brave man. In this affair of the sheriffdom he kept prudence in its proper place : when the voice of duty was clear, its mouth was shut.

* The italics are Howard's.

The office of sheriff had been hitherto but a dignifying appendage ; its duties mainly those of show. Howard could not regard or treat it thus. He went to his work as usual, quietly, accurately, thoroughly. From time immemorial abuses had prevailed ; safely wrapped in the mantle of custom, they had lived, and moved, and done their measure of evil, unregarded as smoke. The cool, clear eye of Howard, looking straight to the heart of everything, could not but regard them. He had not acted long in the capacity of sheriff, when his attention was arrested by something which struck him as strange and anomalous : something which had its existence amid the light of a brilliant and boasted civilization, but which was fitted rather to cower, snake-like and slimy, in the jungles of barbarism. He fixed his attention upon certain persons who were declared not guilty by the voice of their countrymen, who were acquitted of everything laid to their charge, and thus proved to have endured the hard affliction of confinement and temporary disgrace, when their country had nothing whatever to say against them. He saw that these, on their acquittal, did not immediately return to their welcoming and consoling friends ; that their chains were not at once struck off, with urgent haste and self-accusing regret : they were conveyed back to prison until they should pay certain fees to functionaries connected with the jail and court. Others, who also might have suffered months of confinement, and against whom, from the non-appearance of their prosecutors, not even a charge was preferred, were similarly treated. Others still, regarding whom the Grand Jury could not find such evidence of guilt as rendered it reasonable to try them, went the same way :—all, without semblance of accusation, were haled back to prison. This cruel and glaring outrage on justice and feeling was quietly taking its course, and was likely for some time to do so, in the county of Bedford, when it fixed the gaze of John Howard. Its days were numbered.

His proceedings were quick : observation, decision, and action, seem almost to have been united. The abuse was undeniable and indefensible ; its mode of cure was by paying, in some other manner, the functionaries interested. The justices of the county were the men to be applied to ; the application was made. But it now became apparent that the days of an abuse, though numbered, may continue for some time to run. A new thing this in the experience of the sedate magistrates ; it was proper to proceed with caution, deliberation, and prudence. The good, formal, drowsy justices looked up through their spectacles, and—found it necessary—to satisfy their minds—by seeing a precedent. Here, then, perhaps, the matter would stop, and the justices be troubled in their dozing no further. Howard did not stop. A precedent must be found : he takes horse at once, and proceeds to seek it in the neighbouring counties.

In those counties Howard met on all hands with injustice and disorder, but found no precedent for his proposed remedy. He saw more than he expected, and more than he came to seek. In his own simple words, he “ beheld scenes of calamity.” Such he could not see without a desire to alleviate ; and a desire with Howard passed, of necessity, into action. Gradually it became plain to him that he had discovered a great work to be done, and that he was the man intended by God to do it. In the performance of this work the rest of his life was spent, and his name became known and revered in every land under heaven. There are three questions to put and to answer respecting it. What was it ? By what motives was Howard impelled to undertake it ? How did he perform it ? It will be important also to consider, as we proceed, whether it had become necessary.

What was this work of Howard’s ?

Correspondent to, and resulting from, the sad discordance and rent in the individual human soul, there has been, in all ages, a great severance in the human family. A part of that family has been put aside by the rest, and subjected to penal inflictions. Sorrowful, truly, is the prospect thus opened up. In the many-chambered dwelling framed for them by their Father, men could not live together and at peace. The roof and spires of that dwelling seem to rest in sunshine ; in the higher apartments is the voice of mirth and gladness ; lower down the darkness of sorrow begins to thicken ; and, beneath all, there are lightless dungeons, from which, through the whole course of human history, have arisen the broken groans of agony, or the lone wailings of despair. By a stern and awful necessity, these dungeons were never empty ; men were compelled to chain down their brothers in the darkness, lest, like maniacs, they should plunge their knives in the hearts that pitied them, or, like fiends, bring on all the destruction of Sodom : never out of the ears of humanity could pass that doleful voice of lamentation, crying, like the conscience of the race, " Fallen, fallen, fallen."

Respecting these dungeons and their inhabitants, three methods lay open to those who had been bold to take their fellow-men and fling them in fetters out of their sight. They might look down upon them with the fierce glare of indignation, hate, and " revenge ;" they might say, " Caitiffs, we hate you ;" ye have passed beyond the range of law and of pity ; our duty towards you now is to load the whip, and to whet the axe. Or they might adopt a milder, but perhaps still more cruel mode of procedure. They might turn in sickened horror from the sight of the anguish whose existence they would forget ; they might carefully deafen the walls, and stop up every avenue through which the sounds of woe could ascend ; they might then urge the dance, and laugh, and sing ; they might sweep on in the glad pageantry of coronation and victory ; they might listen to the chantings of solemn organs or the light tremblings of bridal music, unsaddened by any cloud that floated up from below. Meanwhile, calamity might be waxing greater and greater there, writing its pale emblems on many faces ; famine, pestilence, torture, might enter unseen ; a groan of agony might go up to heaven, yet pass unheard by men on earth. Or, lastly, they might say, Be these tenants of the dungeon what they may, they are the children of our Father, the creatures of our God ; we dare do to them precisely what He commands, and has rendered necessary. We shall avoid the demoniac fury of the first method, and the cruel cowardice, the inhuman indolence, of the second. We shall do what law ordains, and that alone : we shall light the lamp of Justice, and commit it to the hand of Love.

At the time when Howard appeared, the second of these methods was widely and sadly prevalent ; and the work he did may be briefly but compendiously indicated in these words :—He penetrated into the dungeons of the world, and compelled men to hear the voice of the agony beneath their feet. The result of this work was, that a voice of pity was heard over the world, saying that the method of blind and revengeful cruelty had gone too far, and that the third method must now be attempted.

In what light did Howard regard his work, and what motives impelled him to undertake it ? Ignorant as a child of metaphysical speculation, his simple theory of the world was, that all men are alike devoid of merit before God, and that there is no reason, by possibility, to be alleged why we should not love every member of the human family. To one expressing surprise at his deep love and pity for the depraved, he made answer thus :—“ I consider that, if it had not been for divine grace, I might have been as abandoned as they are.” In these words is contained, not only an exposition and defence of Howard’s views as a philanthropist, but the whole philosophy of Christian Philanthropy. The subordinate motives which urged Howard on his enterprise, and supported him in its achievement, are easily discoverable. It is certain that the precise position into which he was brought by the death of his wife rendered his home a place of small comfort. It is true, also, that he had travelled much during his life, and that travelling was by no means disagreeable to him. But the motive which beyond all others impelled him to the work was a conviction that the voice of God bade him go forth. No man in this world acts on a single or simple motive ; and persistent, courageous work extorts the admiration and honour of men, though its motive is not of the noblest. To say that no lower motive than the approbation of God influenced Howard, would be to say that he was no mere man ; but few, or perhaps none, have acted more purely on the highest motive. "Howard is a beautiful philanthropist, eulogized by Burke, and, in most men's minds, a sort of beatified individual. How glorious, having finished off one's affairs in Bedfordshire, or, in fact, finding them very dull, inane, and worthy of being quitted and got away from, to set out on a cruise over the jails, first of Britain, then, finding that answer, over the jails of the habitable globe ! 'A voyage of discovery, a circumnavigation of charity ; to collate distresses, to gauge wretchedness, to take the dimensions of human misery :'—really, it is very fine." These keen and sarcastic words are manifestly intended to convey an impression that in choosing his work Howard had some thought of the "glorious" aspect it would bear in the eyes of men, how grand it would look, how much men would talk about it. The testimony of bare and unassailable facts renders it plain that in few instances recorded in human history, perhaps hardly in any, could such an impression be more profoundly incorrect. Howard's eye was closed as scarce ever human eye was closed, to every influence within the atmosphere of earth. He looked, with a silent earnestness whose intensity was sublime, for recognition and reward, right into the eye of God. In this highest of all regards he may be mentioned with the holiest of men, with Moses, Daniel, and John.

Our third question, how did Howard perform his work, must be answered at somewhat greater length. We come to look upon him in his actual operations. To detail his several journeys in Great Britain and on the Continent, is indeed impossible here; nor is the attempt in any respect called for; the outline of his work can be sketched, and its general spirit displayed, in a few comprehensive glances.

About the close of the year 1773, there might have been seen, on the high roads of the counties adjoining Bedford, a gentleman on horseback, followed by his servant, travelling at the rate of forty miles a-day. At every town where he rested, he visited the jail. There was no fuss or hurry in his motions, he never lost a moment, he never gave a moment too little to the business in hand, nothing escaped his eye, and there was no spot into which he did not penetrate. He went into places where the noisome and pestilential air compelled him to draw his breath short, where deadly contagion lurked, where physicians refused to follow him. Unagitated yet earnest, he measured every dungeon, explored every particular respecting fare, accommodation, and fees, inquired after the prevalence of disease and the means adopted for its prevention, and learned in every instance the relation which the criminals held to those who superintended and kept the jail. He rested not until he had gone east and west, until he had carried his researches over the jails of Britain and of Europe, until he could credibly declare what was the state of the prisons of the world. That gentleman was John Howard. Was the scene which discovered itself to his eye such as confirms the idea that the time had arrived when an offence against God and man was no longer to be endured, and when rays of light, as just as beneficent, were to be cast into dungeons that had long been seen only by Heaven ?

A few facts, illustrative of Howard's mode of working, will form the best reply.

He saw prevailing far and wide in England, that palpable and cruel injustice which first set him on his journeying : men declared guiltless were still laid in the dungeon. He found that in the same land it was possible for one whose neighbour owed him a paltry sum, to deprive that neighbour of his liberty, and subject himself and his family to everything short of absolute starvation ; nay, to starvation itself, if it was spread over months instead of days. He found, still under the kindly skies of that free, enlightened, and religious country, that it was possible for men to be farmed by a fellow-man, and fed from so miserable a pittance that they must have suffered the perpetual gnawings of hunger. He found dens or holes under ground, of dimensions such as might have held one wild animal, where several human beings were flung, to gasp and groan the night long. In some, the heat and closeness must have been stifling ; in some, the floors were wet and the walls dripping ; in some, open and reeking sewers poisoned the air ; all that is noisome and revolting to the human sense lay bare to his sickened but unflinching gaze. Death, he discovered, had here a realm of his own, where he escaped the eye of justice and humanity. From time immemorial, uncured and uncared for, a virulent fever dwelt in those dreary abodes ; it had a character of its own ; it was the progeny and it seemed the genius of the place ; it was called the jail-fever. There, in darkness, famine, and loathsome horrors, it preyed on those victims who were handed over to it, and whose life-strength was broken by shame, sorrow, and despair ; like a cruel and insatiate vulture, which men permitted to tear out the hearts of their brethren, chained in the depths of dungeons. Year by year, its victims were counted by the score and the hundred ; many of them mere debtors, and few of them proved guilty ; a grave and notable fact, slight it who will, if nations are answerable to God for the blood they shed ! Nor was the jail-fever alone ; the small-pox raged fiercely, and the malignity of every other form of disease was heightened ; the want of air, the damp vapours, the insufficient food, and other causes too many to recount, exaggerated every tendency to consumption, rheumatism, palsy, and other nameless ailments. He found that not only the body was delivered over, bound hand and foot, to pestilence and famine, but that every soul which entered those dens seemed literally committed for custody to the evil power. All the maladies which can infect a mind still partially pure, when villany recounts and gloats over its crimes, finding its only recreation in the exercise, spread their contagion there ; while drinking, swearing, gambling, and indecency, were the appropriate accompaniments and aids in the work. The jail-fever was not the worst enemy men encountered in a prison !

The cases of individual woe which Howard saw may be imagined, but cannot be detailed. They were such as might have wrung forth tears of blood. Pale and haggard faces on which the light had not looked until its glare pained the glazed and hollow eye, spirits broken, hearts hopeless, ghastly beings who had, long years ago, left all the paths where comfort encourages, and better prospects smile, however faintly, in the distance, and who now stood fronting mankind with fiendish scowl, in the gaunt defiance of despair ; men who, for small debts, after long years, died in prison ; fathers sustained in their dreary confinement by the families whose main support they had hitherto been, and several of whose younger members dropped at the time significantly into the grave ; women lying desolate, far from every friendly eye, from every cheering word, and dying of incurable disease ;

brother mortals driven mad by anguish, whose cries in their places of confinement attracted the passer-by. Such were the sights which, in the course of his various journeys over England and the world, John Howard saw. Had the time come for philanthropy ?

Howard had not been long engaged in his work, ere the report of it reached the House of Commons. The House had been lately concerning itself with such things, and Howard was called to give evidence regarding what he had seen. His answers were deemed clear and satisfactory, and he formally received the thanks of the House. One Honourable Member, however, hearing of his long and expensive circuits, and finding the idea new to him that such things should be done without cash payment, begged to be informed whether he had travelled at his own expense. The man to whom the question was put was no sentimentalist, but that question touched him in the heart ; indignation, and contempt, and the tears of outraged modesty, seem to have blended with scorn, as he spurned the unconscious compliment of Mammon.

In the course of the year 1774 two bills were passed : one abolished the injustice relating to the fees, the other had reference to the health of prisoners. Howard said nothing ; but, in his own way, had them both printed at his expense, and sent one to every jailor in the kingdom.

About the close of the same year, he was requested to stand candidate for the borough of Bedford. He acceded to the request, and very narrowly missed his seat. He imputed his failure to Government influence ; and, however this may have been, we learn from his words on the occasion, that he was by no means a man who concerned himself alone with village politics, or was harnessed to one idea. He had cast his eyes on the awakening motions of the great western giant, and boldly avowed his opposition to part of the policy adopted towards America. He also openly and emphatically declared that, if elected, he would never accept of five shillings of emolument. He felt the loss of his seat somewhat deeply, but, as usual, resigned himself with calmness to the disposal of Providence.

Meanwhile, his peculiar work had not been abandoned. He set out for Scotland and Ireland, and prosecuted still farther his researches in England. He was just a month at home about the election business ; in noting his method of going about his work here, one hardly sees wherein his "energy" was specially "slow."

Having looked with his own eyes into the prisons of England, Scotland, and Ireland, he sat down, in the beginning of 1775, in his house at Cardington, to arrange his materials for the press, and offer to the world such suggestions as he now felt himself in a position to offer. But a thought struck him. There were other prisons in the world besides those of Britain ; on the Continent of Europe might not new miseries be seen, and might not valuable hints be obtained ? The fact was palpable ; but then it delayed the work, and was so tedious. Howard calmly laid aside his papers, got ready his travelling gear, and set out for the Continent. There was "slow" energy here ; and of a particularly valuable sort.

Howard's first journey in the inspection of Continental prisons lay through France, Holland, part of Flanders, Germany, and Switzerland. His researches were conducted in his usual way—quietly, quickly, thoroughly ; his sense of justice marking every abuse, his sagacity noting every excellence. He did not travel so far without seeing misery, and here again comfort and hope went along with him into many a dreary dungeon ; but the general glance at Continental prisons afforded revelations which redounded to the honour of the Continent, and to the shame of Britain. It is true that he did not gain access to the severest form of confinement in France ; his daring attempt to enter the Bastille was foiled. It is true, likewise, that he did discover traces of torture such as were not known in England. But in cleanliness, order, and the general characteristic of being cared for, the Continental jails had the clear superiority. In Holland,—at that time, to all appearance, the most orderly and internally prosperous kingdom of Europe,—he saw in operation a system of management of criminals, in its main outlines, wise and humane. And the jail-fever existed only in Britain !

On returning from the Continent, he applied himself to the publication of his work on Prisons. His friends Aiken and Price assisted him in arranging his matter and securing literary correctness. The book was printed at Warrington. It was severe winter weather, yet Howard was always up by two in the morning, revising proof-sheets ; at eight, he was at the printing-office, having just dressed for the day and breakfasted ; here he remained till one, when the men went to dinner ; he then retired to his adjoining lodgings, and taking in his hand some bread and raisins, or other dried fruit, generally walked for a little in the outskirts of the town, calling probably on a friend. The printers by this time had returned, and, proceeding to the printing-office, he continued there until work was over. Still untired, he went then to look over, with Aiken, the sheets put together by the latter during the day. His supper consisted of a cup of tea or coffee, and he retired to rest at ten or half-past ten.

The book published by Howard requires no comment. It is a type of his work ; accurate, substantial, valuable, but devoid of everything allied, even most distantly, to adornment. It is rather a book of statistics than anything else, and as such there can be no doubt it was mainly regarded by himself : the facts of the case were wanted, and these he gave. It was published in 1777, and additions were made at several subsequent periods.

In the course of the same year, by the death of his sister, he inherited L.15,000. This addition to the means at his command he resolved to devote entirely to the prosecution of that task which he believed to have been appointed him by God. He knew his son to be amply provided for, even though his patrimonial estate was encroached upon ; but this enabled him to leave that estate untouched. Howard did his work not merely without cash payment ; he devoted to it every farthing he could conscientiously expend.

For several years now his course does not demand a detailed account. He went on calmly and indefatigably, ever widening the range of his excursions, and ever rendering more perfect what he had already done. Again and again he visited the prisons of England, Scotland, and Ireland ; again and again he swept over the Continent, the speed of his journeys equalled only by the thoroughness of his work. He had in every respect attained perfect adaptation to this last. By long and vigorous temperance, entire abstinence from animal food and intoxicating liquors, and a constant use of the bath, his early weakness of frame seems to have been exchanged for a considerable hardiness ; he inured himself to do without sleep to such an extent, that, on his journeys, one night in three, and that taken sometimes in his carriage, sufficed ; so simple was his fare, that he could, without boasting, profess himself able to subsist wherever men were to be found, wherever the earth yielded bread and water. The tourist in the Highlands of Scotland might have seen him stopping at the cabin by the wayside to obtain a little milk ; among the mountains of Sweden he pushed on, undaunted and tireless, living on sour bread and sour milk ; on the bleak plains of Russia, his lean and somewhat sallow face, and small spare figure, might have been marked as he dashed past in his light carriage ; he was on the high roads of France, in the mountain gorges of Switzerland, tossing on the Mediterranean or the Adriatic. Never did he tarry, never did he haste, never was he moved from his deliberate and wakeful calmness. No personal duty was neglected. His son he always carefully remembered, having him near him at all needful and proper seasons, and diligently inquiring after the best instructors and guardians, to whose care to commit him. The little cottages of Cardington were not forgotten. These grew ever more numerous, and their inmates were well remembered : the work of alleviating the sorrow of the world did not prevent the little drops of comfort which had gladdened them while their kind landlord dwelt beside, from falling within them still. And wherever Howard was, it was impossible for men not to discern wherein lay the secret of his indefatigable perseverance, his unwavering valour, his perpetual calm. In whatever land he was, and amid whatever observers, he never forgot or hesitated to join in evening prayer with his attendant ; the door was shut, and the master and servant knelt down together, as if at home in quiet Cardington. For his own exertions, his one reason was, that he believed himself doing the will of God ; for the disposal of all events he trusted, with the simplicity of a little child, and the faith of a Hebrew patriarch, to the immediate power of Jehovah. He passes by contending armies ; we mark a shudder thrilling through his frame, but we see him also lift his eye upwards, and comfort himself with the knowledge that God is sitting King over the floods. He enters dungeons where others shrink back from the tainted air ; duty, he says, has sent him there, and Providence can preserve him. He is cast on a bed of pain and languor ; he bows submissive to the chastening hand of his Father, or bends his head, and asks wherefore He contendeth with him. Men look upon him with various feelings. The cold, the hard, the cruel, scorn his whole enterprise ; the worshippers of Mammon look on amazed, scarce finding heart to sneer ; gradually, from all lands, there begins to rise a deep, earnest sound of approbation and acclaim. Howard hears neither sneers nor acclamations : he listens for the voice which seems to the world to be altogether silent.

As the eye follows him during these years, it is impossible not to discern a remarkable dexterity and adroitness in carrying through whatever business presents itself—a quick perception of what the case demands—a sure sagacity in providing against it—a ready adaptation to circumstances, and swift assumption of the character necessary for the occasion : all which it seems really difficult to reconcile with dulness.

Look at him, for instance, in that visit to Russia, in which he excited the interest, and was invited to the court, of Catharine.

Unbroken by the toils and hardships undergone in Sweden, where not even tolerable milk could be obtained to put into his unfailing tea, he arrives in the neighbourhood of St Petersburg. Forgetful of nothing, and conscious that his fame now goes before him, and is apt to interfere with his work, he leaves his carriage in the neighbourhood, and enters the town privately. The Empress, however, has her eye upon him, and sends a messenger to invite him to the palace. Here is clearly a call to the highest distinction and applause,—to become the observed of all observers,—in the smile of one whose smile secures that of all others. If there is observable weakness, even pardonable weakness, in his nature,—if the appearance of his work, in the eyes of men, does sensibly affect him,—here is a case for the quiet gratification of the hidden feeling, without the likelihood, nay, the possibility, of its being ever called in question. There are positive arguments, too, which seem plausible enough. The Empress may be won to a special interest in prisons ; philanthropy may kindle itself in the court ; what unconceived good may shape itself out therefrom is not to be measured. Howard looks into the invitation with his cool, piercing English eye, flashing at once through all plausibilities into the heart of the matter ; he feels instinctively that his work is in the dungeon, and not the palace, and that to encircle it with a blaze of publicity will probably interfere with the positive rugged task he has appointed himself: he refuses the invitation.

Once in St Petersburg, he is soon at his work.

He has heard much of the humanity of the Russian criminal arrangements ; and, for one thing, it has been boasted to him that capital punishment is here abolished. His strong instinctive sagacity doubts the fact. But how attain a knowledge of the truth ? All authorities simply give the bland assurance that it is so ; the published codes bear witness to the same ; how can one get past what is said and seen, to be assured there is no discordance between that and the actual inner fact ? Howard hires a hackney coach, and drives to the house of the man who inflicts the knout. This first precaution is necessary to remove all appearance of being a stranger. He enters quickly, wearing a purpose-like, business-like look, as of one who is in the simple discharge of his duty. The man eyes him with astonishment, and somewhat of fear. Howard addresses him, soothingly but firmly ; no evil is intended towards him ; he has but to answer, clearly and at once, the questions about to be put. Howard's look is cool and adroit ; the Russian is all submission and complaisance : the colloquy commences :—"Can you inflict the knout in such a manner as to occasion death in a short time ?"—"Yes, I can." "In how short a time ?"—"In a day or two." "Have you ever so inflicted it ?"—"I have." "Have you lately ?"—"Yes ; the last man who was punished with my hands by the knout died of the punishment." "In what manner do you thus render it mortal ?"—"By one or more strokes on the sides, which carry off large pieces of flesh." "Do you receive orders thus to inflict the punishment?"—"I do." The brief, soldier-like inquiry is completed; not a point has been omitted; Howard is satisfied, and departs. The elaborate cloaking of Russian policy, the infernal cruelty masked under the diabolic smile, has been penetrated by the simple, plain-looking Englishman, now approaching his sixtieth year.

While prosecuting his researches in St Petersburg, overcome by his exertions in Sweden, and affected probably by the climate, Howard is seized with the ague. He has no time to spare; his work waits at Moscow; he procures a light carriage, and sets out. The ague is still on him, but his strong spirit shakes it away; he travels it off. The journey to Moscow is five hundred miles; in less than five days he is there, his clothes having never been off since starting. He enters Moscow as calmly as if returning from a drive in the suburbs, and is instantly at his work. Such is the old man's way—"the dull, solid Howard."

Consider, again, that tour in France, when he was forbidden to pass the frontiers. The interdict is strict. He has seriously offended the French Court by plain truths, and researches not to be baulked. He ponders the circumstances with his usual calmness; duty seems to speak clearly; he resolves to enter France. He assumes the disguise of a physician—having formerly acquired some knowledge of medicine; adroitly escapes arrest in Paris; and on the streets of Toulon foots it trippingly as a French exquisite. He attains his object, and leaves France by sea. In the face of the French Government he has crossed the country, and made what observations seemed to him good. Whatever may be said of the achievement, it surely does not look like that of the mere shiftless mechanical workman.

In more private instances the case was similar. He visits the Justitia hulk. The captain brings him a biscuit as sample of the provisions: it is as wholesome as could be wished.

Howard puts it in his pocket. All necessary information seems to have been obtained, yet he lingers ; there is one on board who wishes he would take himself off. He has, in fact, been making observations in his own way ; his eyes are open as well as his ears. He remarks that things have a tawdry, disordered look, that the prisoners are sickly and tattered, that there are several things here which the captain's relation, so frankly given, does not embrace. Accordingly he waits. At length the messes are weighed out, Howard looking on quite calm, but with something of expectation in his face. Here come the biscuits ; they are in broken bits, green and mouldy ; there is no longer any mystery in the pallid looks of the crew. It is now Howard's turn to speak. Out starts the wholesome biscuit from his pocket ; it is held up, before captain and crew, beside the green loathsome fragments ; and Howard indignantly rebukes the former for his cruelty and falsehood. One can conceive the brightening of the eyes of the crew as they stand by in amazement. If you say Howard was slow and heavy, it might be well to mention how he could have done his work better : if it appears that he was a quick, indefatigable, effective worker, it might be well to consider to what extent biographic veils of dust and cobweb may hide the clear strong lines in the face of a man.

Howard was endowed with no very remarkable intellectual power. That in every mental exertion connected with words, that in everything relating to expression of thought or narration of action, he was naturally devoid of uncommon, perhaps even of ordinary, faculty, must be conceded : the only question which admits of discussion is, whether, in that power of action, that faculty of perceiving and doing the thing needful, with closed or stuttering lips, which has been recognised as characteristically English, he was not so far superior to the common run of men, that his title can be vindicated to a really high endowment ; whether, with what difference soever, he was not cut from that same hard stratum of the Erzgebirge rock from which have come the silent Saxon Clives and Wellingtons. He himself estimated his powers very low. "I am the plodder," he said, "who goes about to collect material for men of genius to make use of." "How often," to use again his own humble words, "have we seen that important events have arisen from weak instruments!" Perhaps, for once, it was right in the human race to set among its honoured and immortal heroes one whose highest glory was his humility, whose greatest strength was his weakness. Yet it were a difficult thing to prove that he did not possess a high talent of the working order. Thurlow was much struck with the sagacity he displayed in an interview he had with him; when clearly set before the eye as they were done, and not as they have been narrated, his actions do not wear an aspect of slowness, dulness, or mere mechanical gyration; the work he had to do required not high intellectual power, but what it did require he fully displayed. Once only does he seem to have failed, or at least to have abandoned an attempt ere effecting the work proposed: he was appointed supervisor of certain penitentiary establishments which were to be erected, and after a time resigned the post. But here he was both hampered by interference, and restrained from the work which he deemed specially his own; perhaps resignation was the most decided, manly, and appropriate course open in the circumstances. What Howard might have been in action, had he in early life been placed in a conspicuous professional or political situation, it is bootless to inquire; yet, considering the long-sustained activity, the inevitable observation, the iron decision, the quick adroitness, which a survey of his career discovers, it is surely no safe assertion that he possessed by nature no power of work, define it as you will, which made him remarkable among men, and would have secured him credit, if not fame, in whatever situation he had been placed.

Howard's last two journeys to the Continent claim a more particular notice than the others.

When he had been long engaged in the work of investigating the state of prisons, and that task had been approximately accomplished all over Europe, it became apparent to him that yet another service was appointed him. He had looked upon one great portion of the human race, which most men forget and despise ; he now turned to look upon another, whose claim upon their brethren is also negative rather than positive, who are held to their hearts solely by the chains of pity,—the sick and diseased of the human family. This other great dumb class was to find an advocate in Howard ; he aspired to perform the twofold angelic office of bringing hope to the prisoner and healing to the sick.

About this time, menacing Europe from the East, lying along its borders like the purple cloud which wraps the Samiel, the destroying pestilence, named by distinction the Plague, seems to have attracted special attention. That slight and sallow man, who had struggled his life-long with sickness, whose face was as that of a hermit in a wilderness, who was slow of speech, and upon whose head had now fallen the snows of nearly threescore winters, marked that Samiel-cloud from afar. He saw it coming slowly, resistlessly on, strewing its way with pallid corpses, taking the smile from off the faces of the nations. He thought it possible that, by entering its shade, he might learn the secret of its baneful energy, and save some of his fellow-creatures from its power. He thought he heard the voice of his God bidding him go ; he looked calmly from his quiet island-home towards Asia and the Ægean, and went. Other diseases were to meet him on the way,—the lazar-houses of Europe were embraced in his enterprise ; but the Plague, like the monarch of the baleful host, was the ultimate, and gradually the principal foe with which the weak Howard was to contend.

Passing over the previous stages of his journey, we find him, in the summer of 1786, in Constantinople. Here he visited the hospitals and lazarettos, every den and stronghold of the plague. As he entered, a pain smote him across the forehead, continuing for an hour after he left ; his conductors drew back in fear ; he saw what was oppressive to soul and sense ; yet he never flinched,—never abandoned that calm, heaven-lit look, which nought on earth could darken or abash,—never stopped till his task was done.

This once accomplished, he prepared to return to Vienna. But he paused ; a thought had struck him,—he could not proceed. The prison-world he had entered solely as a visitor ; in no other capacity was there a possibility of his doing so. But was not the case altered here ? Was there not a way of learning the secrets of lazarettos more thorough than that of mere inspection and hearsay ? There was, and Howard saw it. Yet the condition was stern. It was, that he should enter a lazaretto, and, confined himself, learn, beyond possibility of deception, the state and feelings of its inmates. The old man deliberately accepted the condition, and proceeded to enter a lazaretto. From Constantinople he sailed for Smyrna, chose there a vessel with a foul bill of health, and departed for Venice. On leaving the Morea, where the vessel took in water, they were borne down upon by a Tunisian pirate, and a fight ensued. To the astonishment of the crew, Howard stood by perfectly calm. At length the pirate seemed about to prevail. As a last resort, the Turks loaded their largest cannon to the muzzle with nails, spikes, and what destructive missiles could be found. Howard stepped forward, seeing probably that the men mismanaged the matter, and coolly pointed the gun on the enemy's deck ; the volley burst forth, carrying death among their crew ; as the smoke rolled along the sea, the pirate was seen hoisting sail, and bearing away. The voyage proved long and stormy. For two months Howard was tossed about alone in wild, dangerous weather; yet he bore a brave heart through it all. "I well remember," he says, "I had a good night, when, one evening, my cabin-biscuits, &c., were floated with water; and, thinking I should be some hours in drying it up, I went to bed to forget it."

Arriving at Venice, he found he had to spend two months in the lazaretto. He was first put into a loathsome room, "without table, chair, or bed," and swarming with vermin. He hired a person to cleanse it, and the operation occupied two days, yet it remained offensive; headache, caused by the tainted air and infected walls, perpetually tormented him. From his first apartment he was, after some time, removed to another as bad as the former. Here, in the division of the apartment where he was to sleep, he was "almost surrounded with water," and found a dry spot on which to fix his bed only by kindling a large fire on the flags. Six days he remained in the new quarter. Once more he was removed, and this time there appeared at least a possibility of improvement. His new apartment was, indeed, unfurnished, filthy, and "as offensive as the sick-wards of the worst hospitals." But the water and the vermin seem to have disappeared. The rooms, however, were full of contagion, for they had not been cleaned from time immemorial; and though Howard had them washed again and again with warm water, he found his appetite failing, and a slow fever beginning to fasten upon him. But he was on no theatrical mission, and would die at his post only when all remedy failed him. Here, again, we meet the difficulties of the theory touching his slow and shiftless dulness. With the aid of the English consul, he obtained brushes and lime; his attendant—for a consideration—assisted him in manufacturing whitewash; despite the prejudices of the observers, he rose up three hours before his guard, and commenced, along with his former assistant, to whitewash his apartment. He resolved to lock up his guard if he interfered : one is almost sorry the man did not, for Howard would have kept to his determination. All who passed by looked with astonishment at the whitened and wholesome walls, where so many had been contented to pine and repine, with no attempt at cure.

The days in the Venice lazaretto rolled slowly on, wearisome, dismal, unvarying ; Howard watched everything, knew everything, and felt the weariness he longed to relieve. His faith failed not ; with calm and easy feelings he looked forward to the term of his confinement. But suddenly there came a change : darker clouds than had ever yet cast their shadow over him took their course towards that dreary lazaretto. On the 11th of October 1786, he received letters from England, with two pieces of information. The one was, that his son was following evil courses, and dashing wildly on in a path whose end, dimly indicated to the father, must be one of the deepest darkness : the other, that a movement was proceeding in England, under high and promising auspices, for the erection of a monument to himself. Not hearing, at first, the worst concerning his son, he wrote home with deep sorrow, yet in hope. The proposal for a monument next required his attention. An English gentleman had formerly had an interview with Howard at Rome of an hour's length, and the result was an admiration on the part of the former which knew no bounds. On his return to England, he had proposed, through the columns of the Gentleman's Magazine, that a public monument should be erected to one whom he styled "the most truly glorious of human beings." The wide-spread and profound admiration for Howard which, ere this time, had sunk into the British mind, had thus found vent ; the proposal had at once taken effect, and the movement was headed by certain noblemen.

With astonishment it was heard that Howard wrote absolutely refusing the honour, and alleging that the idea of it gave him exquisite pain. At first this was thought a graceful mode of acceptance, or at least a struggle of excessive modesty, easily to be overborne ; but the fact was soon put beyond dispute. Even after long arguing and urging by intimate and honoured friends, he decidedly and unalterably refused. From the lazaretto of Venice he wrote to his friend Mr Smith of Bedford, rehearsing the directions he had given, ere quitting Cardington, respecting his obsequies ; his words were these, copied now with no alteration, and with no comment :—

“(a) As to my burial, not to exceed ten pounds.

“(b) My tomb to be a plain slip of marble, placed under that of my dear Henrietta's in Cardington Church, with this inscription :—

“ ‘ John Howard, died —, aged —.

My hope is in Christ.’ ”

Some time after, in grateful and courteous terms, he signified to his well-wishers in England that his resolution was fixed, and that he would accept no public mark of approbation.

Let this fact be candidly weighed ; and let it then be said whether what has been alleged regarding Howard's grand motive in his work is other than the bare and faintly-expressed truth. For himself he would have no glory. He accept honour from men, who was the weakest of instruments, and whose highest honour it was that he was worthy to be made an instrument at all in the hand of God ! He stop to be crowned by men, whom the Almighty had honoured with His high command, and permitted to give strength and comfort for Him ! He listen to the applause of the nations, whom his inmost heart knew to be weak and unworthy, and whose inspiring and indestructible hope it was, that he might be numbered even among the least in the kingdom of heaven ! The people seemed in loud acclaim to say, Thou hast brought us water out of the rock : Howard, with eager face, and outstretched hand, and heart pained to the quick, cried out, I have done nothing, I deserve nothing ; God has done all.

Released from the lazaretto, and after spending a week in Venice, Howard proceeded by sea to Trieste, and thence to Vienna. During this time, the fever he had escaped for a time continued to creep over him, the whole air of the lazaretto having been infected : it greatly impaired his strength ; and the accounts, deepening in sadness, which reached him respecting his son, made his affliction almost too heavy to bear :—"I am reduced by fatigue of body and mind ; I have great reason to bless God my resolution does not forsake me in so many solitary hours." It did not forsake him ; it remained firm as a rock in vexed surge, that could ever raise its head into the pure light of God's smile ; but human faith has not often been so sorely tried. In the letter written from Vienna, from which the above words are taken, he referred in approving terms to the conduct towards his son of several domestics whom he had left at Cardington, expressed his persuasion that it arose out of regard to his mother, and concluded the paragraph in these words :—"Who, I rejoice, is dead." He often thought of Harriet ; and we may conceive that now, in his extreme sorrow, the old days would flit past him robed in the still and melancholy light of memory ; that tender, and to him beautiful wife, seemed to return to lean over him in his loneliness and sickness of heart ; but he thought of his son, and the tear which started to his own eye was transferred by imagination to that of his Harriet, where perchance he had never seen one before ; then love arose and triumphed over anguish, and he blessed God that his best beloved was lying still. Has art ever surpassed the pathos of those words ?

Early in 1787 Howard was again in England, proceeding to make arrangements respecting his son. The latter was a hopeless maniac. He appears to have been of that common class of young men whom strong passions, weak judgment, and good-natured, silly facility, render a prey to those who combine artfulness with vice. A servant in whom Howard placed absolute confidence betrayed his trust infamously, allured his charge into evil, and excited in his breast contempt for his father. That father, ever most anxious to provide him the best and safest superintendence and tuition, had sent him to prosecute his education at Edinburgh, where he resided with Dr Black. There it was that prolonged habits of vice fatally impaired his constitution, and after a period he became deranged. In this condition, watched over with all the care and kindness which his father's efforts could secure, he lingered for a considerable number of years, and died. It was a touching case ; for he seems not to have been without that gleam of nobleness which so often accompanies and adorns a character not intellectually strong. In Edinburgh once, when some one spoke disrespectfully of his father, and basely hinted that his philanthropic expenses might impair the fortunes of his son, young Howard indignantly resented the insinuation, and asked how he could ever do so much good with the money as his father.

Howard now remained in England for about two years, seeing his son provided for as well as was possible, and preparing the result of his travels for the press. His religion still continued to deepen and to grow more fervent ; the feeling of the littleness of his efforts and powers to increase. The few private memoranda that remain of the period breathe an earnest and habitual devotion ; there is in them an occasional flash of clear intellectual insight and moral ardour ; but, most of all, they are characterized by humility. "Examples of tremendous wrath will be held up, and what if I should be among these examples !" "Behold, I am vile ; what shall I answer Thee, oh my God ! I have no claim on Thy bounty but what springs from the benignity of Thy nature. God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of Jesus Christ." "A few of God's people that met in an upper room appear, in my eye, greater than all the Roman empire. God kept them." "Where there is most holiness, there is most humility. Never does our understanding shine more than when it is employed in religion. In certain circumstances retirement is criminal ; with a holy fire I would proceed." "Ease, affluence, and honours, are temptations which the world holds out ; but, remember, 'the fashion of this world passeth away : ' on the other hand, fatigue, poverty, sufferings, and dangers, with an approving conscience. Oh God ! my heart is fixed, trusting in Thee ! My God ! Oh glorious words ! there is a treasure, in comparison of which all things in this world are dross."

England was now for Howard all hung as it were in weeds of mourning. The hope to which he had clung that his son might cheer him in his old age had vanished utterly ; or at least the term when such might be possible could not be fixed. There were probably in this world few sadder hearts at that time than John Howard's. But he had not yet discovered the secret of the plague ; there was still work for mercy to do : it was now perhaps the greatest happiness of which he was capable to go upon that work. And he went ; the weary heart, to soothe and heal the weary-hearted ; one of the saddest men in England, to meet the plague.

On the 27th of September 1789, he was at Moscow. He seemed now to feel that his end was not far ; and we find him engaged in solemn transactions with his God. He brought out that old dedication of himself to his Maker, which we saw him subscribe in the days when his life had first been darkened, and when the terrors of the Almighty, which had rolled like low cloudy masses over his soul, were becoming suffused with celestial radiance in the full beaming out of the Sun of Righteousness. Again he owned his entire unworthiness and his entire weakness ; again he looked up to the Rock of Ages ; again he gave himself up, soul, spirit, and body, for ever and ever, to God. As we gather, too, from the pages of Brown, he looked again on that covenant which his wife had made with her Father in heaven : one can see the old and weary man gazing over its lines, while a tear steals from his eye, a tear of lonely sadness, yet touched with one gleam of light, from the thought that it will not now be long ere he again meet his Harriet. This was in the September of 1789 : it was his last pause on his hard life-journey, his last draught of living waters from those fountains which Divine Love never permits to dry up in the desert of the world : again he arose and went on his way ; but now the pearly gates and the golden walls stood before the eye of faith, calm, beautiful, eternal, on the near horizon.

In the beginning of January 1790, he was residing at Kherson, a village on the Dnieper, near the Crimea, still, as of old, with indefatigable resolution and kindness pursuing his work. In visiting a young lady dying of a fever the infection seized him, and he soon felt that death was upon him. On his death-bed he was what we have always known him. We hear the voice of prayer for his son, of inextinguishable pity for the afflicted, and, concerning himself, these words, addressed to his friend Admiral Priestman—"Let me beg of you, as you value your old friend, not to suffer any pomp to be used at my funeral, nor any monument nor monumental inscription whatsoever, to mark where I am laid : but lay me quietly in the earth, place a sun-dial over my grave, and let me be forgotten." Thus, with the same calm, saintly smile, so still but so immoveable, which he had worn during life, he passed away.

All nations had now heard of Howard, and all nations honoured him. England, in silent pride, placed his statue in St Paul's Cathedral. There he remained unmoved, and his name more and more became a word of love and of admiration in the households of the world. Burke spoke of him in his own burning and majestic terms; Foster pointed to him as one cased in an iron mail of resolution such as made him a wonder among the sons of men; Chalmers responded to his nobleness with the tameless enthusiasm of that royal heart. But in our day a mighty hand has been stretched forth to drag him from his seat among the immortal ones of time: one, of perhaps more wondrous genius, and in some sense of more penetrating intellectual glance, than either Chalmers, Burke, or Foster, has flung quiet but remorseless scorn on Howard. That one is Thomas Carlyle. It is unnecessary to quote his words: those which seem to approach nearest to positive misconception and injustice have been already set before the reader. They are well known, occurring in the celebrated pamphlet on Model Prisons. It can be stated in a word or two what Mr Carlyle has seen, and what, making appeal to readers, it may without presumption be said that he has not seen, in Howard. He has seen regarding him that of which he appears, in all cases, to possess a more vivid perception than any writer of past or present times—the intellectual type and calibre. Doubts may be entertained whether a strong case might not be made out in defence even here, if the difference between working and talking talent were accurately defined, and the dulness of biographers taken fully into account. But I care not to urge this consideration on behalf of Howard. I claim for him no intellectual glory. I concede that, if Mr Carlyle does not impute to him any vulgar motive, of desire to make an appearance, or the like,—and I leave readers to judge whether such an impression is, or is not, conveyed by the words cited,—there is nothing which he says concerning him demonstrably false. Say that his highest talents were “English veracity, solidity, simplicity ;” believe him even to have been (if you can, for I positively cannot) “dull, and even dreary ;” still, I ask, is his highest praise the words, so severely qualified by the spirit of the context, “the modest, noble Howard ?” Let any one look along that life, calmly figuring it to himself, pondering it till he knows its real meaning and vital principle, and say whether there burns not through it, however veiled from the general eye, a sublime, an immortal radiance. Let him say whether we cannot utter, with peculiar emphasis and veneration, these words, “The Holy Howard.” It is in this that his claim to be honoured by men consists ;—that he was honoured by God to live nearer to Himself than any but a chosen few of the human race.

And is it not a reasonable and equitable claim ? Is it for ever to be impossible for a man to be honoured of men unless his intellectual power is great ? That were surely hard ; surely essential equality were thus denied me as a man ; surely I could not so be calmly content under this sun. If our relation to the Infinite is of that nature which Christ has unfolded, it cannot be so. If, from the seraphim who receive the light of the throne on their white robes, to the poor widow who kneels by her husband’s corpse, and bows her head to the God who has given and taken away, we are but servants of one Master, soldiers of one host, members of one family, it cannot be so. For then the highest honour of the archangel and of the child is, that he does, well and gladly, and giving God the glory, what Gods bids him do. And methinks it is best even so. We will honour the old soldier, whose name we have never heard, but who at eventide contentedly wound the colours round his heart and died for the good cause, as much as we honour the Cromwell who led that cause to the pinnacles of the world ; ay, and without refusing to obey Cromwell either, without losing one atom of the real worth and value of so-called “hero-worship.” The angel who ministers to a dying beggar may hold himself as highly honoured as he who keeps the gate of heaven.

Howard showed to all men how the weakest do their work in God’s army ; he exhibited, with a strange revealing power, how, were men unfallen, every order of intellectual faculty might be employed to its full extent, but with equal merit, that is, with none, and with equal reward, that is, the free smiling of God’s countenance. Despise him who will on earth, in heaven Isaac Newton does not look with scorn on John Howard ! Is not the special honouring of intellectual greatness, nay, the special honouring of any human being, an effect of the fall ? Is it not the true attitude of all the finite to look around with love on their brethren, but with undivided gaze to look upwards to God ? It would seem assuredly to be so ; and that we now rightly honour our great ones merely because we must fix our poor eyes so steadfastly on them, while, commissioned by God, they lead us onwards towards the eternal light.

Howard is almost alone among those whom men have agreed to honour. They are the intellectually mighty who, by that necessity of our position just glanced at, become best known. Thousands there may be, and there always are, whose lives are “faithful prayers,” who would, with grateful joy, suffer anything for the sake of Christ. But Howard was separated by God for a work which could not but attract attention ; an arduous and a heroic work, for which the time had fully come in the history of the world. For that work he was qualified, and it, with absolute thoroughness, he did. Money was as nothing in his estimation in comparison of it ; but he was as far above fame as money, and no danger or toil could daunt him : “cholera doctors” Mr Carlyle compares to him, but he went where hired doctors would not go ; and what cholera doctor, what man among men, ever went for two months into solitary confinement, amid infection and all discomfort, if perchance he might bring thence one drop of balm for the sorrowful? Then consider his humility: Ah! surely Howard was one of the men who might have been left on his pedestal. Think how he would himself have met Mr Carlyle's scorn. "It is true," he would have said; "such I was, if so good; I was nothing. Go into your great cathedral, and from the midst of your venerated dead cast forth the statue of John Howard; let a white tablet alone recall my memory, and place it beside that of my Henrietta." Howard never asked his fame; in his life he would accept no votive wreath: whatever had been said of his followers, regarding him one might have expected silence. In a very extended sense, his fame was unsolicited. Not only was himself slow of speech, but his biographers were such as has been said. Yet the inarticulate human instinct discerned that there was around him that beauty of holiness which, in the eyes of God and of angels, is alone honourable, and which it is well for men to honour, and placed him in the pantheon of the world. That human instinct was right; there surely he will remain. Look not for him among the high intellectual thrones, among earth's sages or poets, among earth's kings or conquerors. But yonder, among the few lowly yet immortal ones whose fame has been endorsed in heaven, see John Howard. His image is formed of marble, pure as the everlasting snow: away from it, as if desecrating its whiteness, fall the robes of false adornment in which men have sought to envelop it; away also fall all dimming, defacing, distorting veils of misconception; and there beams out clearly the face of a simple, humble man, earnest of purpose, celestially calm, and with one tear of inexpressible love on the cheek; from the heavens comes a viewless hand, encircling the head with a serene and saintly halo, its mild radiance falling over the face, and blending with its speechless human pity ; the eye is fixed on the eternal mansions, and the lips seem ever, in humble and tremulous gratitude, to say, " Lord God, why me ?" The outline and features of that face Mr Carlyle saw, but that halo, and the fixedness of that heavenward gaze, he did not see.

WILLIAM WILBERFORCE.

WILLIAM WILBERFORCE was born in Hull, in August 1759. The auspices of his birth were in important respects favourable : a first glance reveals no exception or abatement to their benignity. Of a wealthy and ancient family, he opened his eyes on a life-path paved by affluence, and thick-strewn with the flowers of indulgence. Every influence around him was of comfort and kindness ; wherever his young eye fell, it met a smile. And his own nature was such as to make him peculiarly susceptible of the delights around. He was, it is true, a tender and delicate child, small for his age, and in no respect of promising appearance ; but there was in his heart an irrepressible fountain of kind and guileless vivacity ; his voice was of sweet silvery tone ; he was gentle and considerate in his ways : altogether, he was a brisk, mildly-spirited, fascinating little thing, who could centre in himself every ray of encircling kindness and comfort, and enhance his enjoyment by radiating out smiles of happy contentment on those around him. All this was well ; perhaps a happier sphere could scarce be imagined ; yet it cannot be pronounced in the highest sense auspicious, because there was wanting in it any high presiding influence of character. The boy's eye could rest on no clear, earnest light of godliness, burning in his father's house ; his parents were conventionally excellent people, respectable, cheerful, hospitable, gay ; nothing better or worse.

In 1768, the father of Wilberforce died : the latter inherited a rich patrimony, which was afterwards increased. The child, now nine years old, was sent to reside with an uncle, living by turns at Wimbledon and St James's Place. Under his roof he came within the sphere of earnest piety. His aunt was one of those unnoticed witnesses to the inextinguishable power of vital Christianity, whose light, kindled by the instrumentality of Whitefield, spread a gentle but precious radiance through the spiritual haze of last century. Under her influence his mind was roused to a new earnestness, and turned with great force in a religious direction. At the age of twelve he wrote such letters on religious subjects as were afterwards deemed by some worthy of publication ; and, though this was wisely prevented, the fact is a proof that his boyish intellect was brought into earnest and protracted consideration of religious truth.

This state of matters was abruptly changed. His mother took the alarm. The prospect that her son should become a canting Methodist was appalling. She immediately recalled him to Yorkshire, and commenced the process of erasing every mark of individual character, of softening down into mere insipidity and commonplace every trait of personal godliness which had appeared. He was at once inaugurated in a course of systematic triviality, not to end until it was fatally too late, whose grand object was to clothe him in the garb of harmless, respectable frivolity, and leave him at last converted into that aimless worshipper of the hour, that lukewarm trimmer between all—in religion, literature, philosophy, and feeling—which is either cold or hot ; that weathercock of vacant mode ; that all-embracing cypher of the conventional—a man of the world.

His name threw open to him, on his return from London, every circle of fashion in Hull. Though still so young, he was introduced into all sorts of gay society. At first his lately-gained principles offered a firm opposition. The loud, half-animal existence of the hearty, hospitable magnates of Hull, contrasted boldly and unfavourably with the religious earnestness of his aunt's life. The fashion was to have dinner parties at two and sumptuous suppers at six, the enjoyment having evidently a close and important connection with the eating and drinking. Of card-parties, dancing, and theatre-going, there was no end. In all this he found at first no pleasure: he turned in aversion from the coarse stimulants of sense, and sighed for the pure and lofty region he had left. But he was still a mere boy. The kindness universally showered on him could not be received with indifference by his warm and impressible nature; his was the age when new habits can yet be formed, and the process still result in charm; worst of all, he perceived that his sprightliness and musical powers enabled him already to diffuse joy around him. The man who can fascinate society is he who of all others is most subject to its fascination. The boy Wilberforce soon participated with joyous sympathy in all the merry-making of Hull.

All this is deeply to be regretted. There is, of course, no harm in the healthful gaiety of youth. The exuberant strength of boyhood rightly prefers the open field to the close school-room, the athletic sport or joyous dance to the demure and measured walk. A strong mental endowment will, it is true, in most, if not in all cases, evince itself by an element of thoughtfulness in early youth; but it is ever a circumstance of evil omen, boding intellectual disease, when the thoughtfulness of boyhood is of power sufficient to overbear its animal vivacity and sportive strength. One thing, however, is ever to be borne in mind touching amusement and its connection with education: it cannot be the whole, but a part; it must derive its zest from being the unstringing of the bow. In the case of Wilberforce, it cannot be doubted that it usurped a place by no means its due,—a place where its influence was one of almost unmixed evil. And his natural temper and disposition were precisely such as rendered this circumstance dangerous. His mind was of a sensitive, impulsive, lively cast, taking quickly the hue of its environment, and perhaps originally deficient in self-determining strength. To discipline his restless energy, to concentrate his volatile faculties, a firm though kind, a calm and methodic though genial training, was required. Instead of this, he was, from early boyhood, the pet of gay circles, where no serious word was spoken, and found himself reaping most abundantly the approbation of his mother, when he flung all earnest thought aside, gave the odds and ends of his time to study, and made it the business of his life to be a dashing, lively, engaging member of fashionable society. That which occupied the formal place of instruction was the tuition of a clerical gentleman who kept an academy. While residing with him, the main part of Wilberforce's education was what intellectual aliment he could gather at the tables of fox-hunting squires and jovial county gentlemen ; and we can conceive the effect upon the now faint religious impressions of the boy, of the spectacle of a man set apart to preach the gospel, whose whole life was a gentlemanly sneer at the spirituality of his office. Ere he proceeded to enter the university, which he did when seventeen years of age, every trace of his early earnestness had been effaced. In all that related to the external qualities of a young man of fashion, his training had been amply successful. His manners were the happy union of sprightliness, ease, and unaffected kindness ; his faculties were acute, his sympathy warm and vivacious, his wit ready and genial ; he sung with grace and sweetness.

Furnished thus upon entering the university, it is scarce to be wondered at that his sojourn there was well-nigh barren of good ; it were perhaps more correct to say, that it was fertile in evil. His character was not, indeed, contaminated by any taint of downright vice : the nature of Wilberforce was always too healthful, too open, free, and sunny for that. But the volatility which naturally characterized him, and whose final triumph, promoted by the studied frivolity of his boyhood, might yet have been averted, was now pampered to fresh luxuriance, and left to spread itself over his mind. The acquisition of the power of sustained and earnest study was neglected. The opportunity of that first introduction to the treasures of the knowledge of the world, which so generally determines the extent to which these treasures are afterwards availed of, was lost. At St John's College, Cambridge, he fell among a set of the most pleasant, good-humoured, hearty fellows in the world. He had lots of money, of temper, of briskness, of wit ; they had free, jovial ways,—didn't mind telling a good fellow what were his good points,—could study themselves, but could not perceive why a man of fortune should work,—could probably tell a good story, give and take a repartee, appreciate a song, or sing one,—last of all, and without any question, had the best appetite for good wine and Yorkshire pie. And so Wilberforce, whose natural quickness enabled him to figure to sufficient advantage at examinations, left study to the poor and the dull : enough for him to be the centre of a joyous and boisterous throng, every good thing he said telling capitally, every face around the board raying forth on him smiles and thankful complacency, the hours dancing cheerfully by, and casting no look behind to remind him that they were gone for ever.

“ The sick in body call for aid ; the sick
In mind are covetous of more disease.”

Those men of St John's College, Cambridge, had the best feelings towards Wilberforce, and seemed to him his truest friends. If you had spoken of him to any of them, you would have heard nothing but affectionate praise, with possibly just the slightest caustic mixture of contemptuous pity; if in their presence you had called him a fool, or struck him on the face, a score of tongues or arms would have moved to defend him. Yet how well had it been for Wilberforce if some rough but kind-hearted class-fellow had turned upon him, like that class-fellow who saved Paley to British literature, and told him roundly he was a trifling fool! How well for him had his dancing-boots been exchanged for Johnson's gaping shoes, his Yorkshire pie for Heyne's boiled pease-cods! With bitter emphasis would he have assented to this in latter days, when he looked back on this time with keen anguish, and said that those who should have seen to his instruction, acted towards him unlike Christian, or even honest men. But such reflections were now in the distance. Fanned by soft adulation, his heart told him he was a clever fellow, who would carry all before him: for the present, he would sing his song, and shuffle the cards, and enjoy all the pleasure he imparted. So it continued until he approached the season of his majority, and it became proper to choose a vocation for life.

Disinclined to mercantile pursuits, he withdrew from the business of which he was at his majority to have become a partner, and turned to another profession; one which may be deemed of some importance,—that of member of the British House of Commons. To be one of the governing council of the British empire, to adjudicate on the affairs of that considerable assemblage of millions, to lend a helping voice and hand to steer the British monarchy in such an era as ours, that it may ever have its head forward, avoiding collisions, and sunken rocks, and quicksands, may be thought a task of some difficulty and solemnity. The instinct of British honour revolts at the idea of its being made a trade: no salaried Members, were your legislators for ever confined to a class in consequence ; but there is no such prevailing abhorrence against its being made an amusement. Accordingly, it is one of what may be styled the hereditary recreations of the British opulent and aristocratic classes ; perhaps of a somewhat higher and more imposing order than fox-hunting and grouse-shooting ; having, in particular, the advantage of serving as a background to these, giving them a look of relaxation in the eyes of the world, imparting to their enjoyment a fine zest, and freeing them of all ennui or monotony. Young Wilberforce, whom we have been observing, and of whose education for this profession we can judge, thought that to be an honourable Member would just suit him. He had, indeed, received a good average training for the business. Quick to acquire, he had secured a fair amount of classical knowledge, and in those vital particulars, suavity of manners, happy fluency of speech, engaging deportment, he was surpassed by none ; the old gaities of Hull, the Olympian suppers of St John's, and an excellent musical talent, would probably set him high among young honourable Members. Besides, he would spend the last year of his minority in London ; in feasting and addressing a number of Hull freemen who lived there, he might make advances in the stiff old art of ruling men ; while his evenings would be spent in actual apprenticeship to his business by attending the gallery of the House. All this was done ; the Member of the British Parliament deemed himself fully equipped. Immediately on becoming of age, Wilberforce was elected by an overwhelming majority for the city of Hull. His seat cost him between L.8000 and L.9000.

Returned by such a constituency, and in such a manner, and on terms of personal intimacy with Pitt, who had been a Cambridge acquaintance, and whom he had met in the gallery of the House, Wilberforce found honourable membership a most easy and animated affair. Acting as background, in the way that has been indicated, it threw out finely the foreground of fun and frolic, of sport and light joyance, of feast, and dance, and merriment, which formed the principal portion of his existence. At the clubs he was received with cheerful welcome ; there, with the men in whose hands were, or were soon to be, the destinies of the British nation, he laughed, and chatted, and sung, and gambled. His winnings were once or twice a hundred pounds, and, happening, on one occasion, from an unforeseen circumstance, to keep the bank, he cleared six hundred. But here, as always on the verge of sheer vice, his better nature checked him ; what would have stamped a man of radical baseness an irretrievable gambler, pained and shocked Wilberforce : he played no more. There was no abatement of any of the other pleasures. " Fox, Sheridan, Fitzpatrick, and all your leading men," frequented those clubs ; Pitt showed himself there as the wittiest of the witty ; altogether, the spectacle presented by British statesmen behind the scenes was one of mirth and exhilaration. Gay, boisterous, frivolous they were ; not devoid of a certain earnestness and business-like expertness when at their work, yet sportive and light of heart, as men whose places were safe, and who, for the rest, had only the matters of a British empire to think of. Wilberforce was by no means a technically inactive member ; he presented to the eye of the world an unimpeachable aspect, and kept his conscience quiet. Seeming, to himself and others, to be doing his whole duty, he was satisfied and happy. Glancing, with his quick, clear eye, into circle after circle—lighting up all faces by the gentle might of his wit, if not with uncontrollable mirth, yet with soft, comfortable smiles—suiting himself, by a tact swift and sudden as magic, to the society or subject of the moment—gesticulating and mimicking with rare histrionic art—pouring forth, in unbroken stream, a warm and glowing eloquence—or gliding softly into one of those songs to which his rich voice lent witching charms—he was the life and soul of supper parties, the caressed of fashionable circles, the darling of the clubs. The Prince of Wales praised his singing ; could human ambition look higher than that ?

After some more Parliamentary work of this nature, Wilberforce flits gaily across the Channel ; we find him in the autumn of 1783, with his friends Pitt and Elliot, in the French capital. It is strangely interesting to mark him as he flutters among the Vauxhall luminaries of the old French court ; light and frivolous almost as they, yet with an open eye, and an English shrewdness, which note well the salient points of the dream-like scene. His jottings are brief but suggestive :—“ Supped at Count Donson’s. Round table : all English but Donson. Noailles, Dupont. Queen came after supper. Cards, tric-trac, and backgammon, which Artois, Lauzun, and Chartres played extremely well.” This was that Artois who goes down to a fool’s immortality as the inventor or possessor of those “ breeches of a kind new in this world,” into which, and from which, his four tall lackeys lifted him every morning and evening ; and this Chartres, who distinguished himself at tric-trac, became Egalité, and found it more difficult to play another game. Had the curtain of the future been drawn aside for a moment before the eyes of the group, and Philip of Orleans seen himself at that moment when he stopped before his own palace on his way to the guillotine, what astonishment, and trembling, and dismay would have sunk over that gay company ! He sees La Fayette, too, and styles him “ a pleasing, enthusiastical man,” surely with happy shrewdness and accuracy. The latter is already a patriot of the most highflown description, on the model of Addison’s Cato. The ladies of the court try to induce him to join in cards ; but will the classic hero compromise the austere dignity of freedom ? The ladies have to glide away in admiring respect, almost in reverence, and the heart of the patriot is strengthened. "The king is so strange a being (of the hog kind), that it is worth going a hundred miles for the sight of him, especially a boar-hunting." This was poor Louis, whose contribution to human knowledge was of so decidedly negative a character; who bore testimony to this one doctrine; whose worth, however, deserved to be written in blood; that nature, in this world, grants painfully little to good intentions. He sees Marie Antoinette frequently, and bears witness to the gentle witchery of her manner, queenly dignity blended with feminine kindness. Seen against the darkness which we know lay in the background, all this gaily-tinted picture, of which Wilberforce for a short space formed an appropriate figure, has a strange and fascinating look. "Light mortals, how ye walk your light life-minuet, over bottomless abysses, divided from you by a film!"

In the spring of 1784 Wilberforce was elected to represent Yorkshire. His popularity in his native county was extreme; and when, after the prorogation of Parliament, he went down to spend his birth-day there, and appeared at the races, the whole era of his history which we now contemplate may be said to have reached its highest manifestation and climax. A running chorus of applauding shouts followed his path; he was the cynosure of all eyes; if vacant stare and noise could make one happy, he were the man.

In October 1784 he left England on a journey to the Continent, in the company of Isaac Milner, brother of the Church historian, and, though unapt to show them, of thoroughly evangelical views. A few serious words which dropped from Milner's lips on the journey, and the effect of a perusal of Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," did not altogether pass away from the mind of Wilberforce; invisibly, perhaps intermittently, yet indestructibly, the disturbing influence acted within. On his return to London, he again rushed into the halls of fashion and frivolity ; now and then a monition of other things flickered momentarily, like the glance of an angel's eye, across his sphere of vision ; but he still continued, with reckless determination, to drain the chalice of wild, unmeasured mirth. No change was seen in the external aspect of his life ; he frisked about at Almack's, danced till five in the morning, charmed and fascinated as before ; yet the monitory glance was at intervals upon him, the perfect peace of death was broken.

In the summer of 1785 he had another Continental tour with Milner. They now conversed more earnestly on the subject of religion, and commenced together the study of the New Testament. The time at length had come from which Wilberforce was to date a new era in his life : the time when he was, whether in delusion or not, to believe himself savingly influenced by the Spirit of the Almighty, and to prepare to walk onwards to eternity under that guidance.

The manner of the change wrought in Wilberforce is of less importance to us than its effects ; but its general aspect must be briefly indicated. It appears highly probable that the religious influence by which we saw him impressed in boyhood never totally lost its effect. Like an ineffaceable writing, it lay in his heart during all those years when the desert sands of vanity swept over it, hidden, perhaps forgotten, but imperishably there : it required but a calm hour and a strong skilful hand, putting aside the sand and revealing the golden characters, to bring the soul of Wilberforce to acknowledge their sacred authority. On this point, however, it is unnecessary to insist ; the matter is, in fact, beyond the reach of positive evidence. He did, at all events, now pause in startled earnestness ; the fleeting monitions could no longer be put aside. The truths of God's Word first forced an intellectual assent ; conscience, after long slumber, then awoke in the might of its divine commission, and, like a heavenly messenger with a sword of fire in the hand, defied him to advance another step. His trouble of soul was long and terrible. He asserted in after years that he had never read of mental agonies more acute than his own ; and it were difficult to over-estimate the weight of this testimony. Yet it was not terror that chiefly dismayed him. "It was not so much," these are his own words, "the fear of punishment by which I was affected, as a sense of my great sinfulness in having so long neglected the unspeakable mercies of my God and Saviour." His soul was not altogether a stranger to fear. The finite being who begins to have a fixed assurance that there is not a relation of perfect concord between himself and the Infinite One, may well experience a feeling of awe ; the man who hears conscience, with iron tongue, proclaiming that sin and misery are as substance and shadow, who has any conception of the deep, drear, moaning affirmative of this, which goes, like a melancholy Arctic wind, over all the centuries of the life of mankind, and who begins to feel that sin lies too deep in his own bosom to be eradicated by mortal hand, may well be afraid. The instinct of the human race echoes the Scripture words, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." But it was no slavish dread which urged him on. His was no longer the reckless bearing of a man of the world, arising from vacancy of thought or sheer imbecility ; nor did he change his attitude for that of shrinking and selfish terror ; nor did he, with haughty recklessness, assert himself against the infinitude of power, a position suiting only the maniac or demon : it was the light of celestial holiness burning eternally around the throne of God in the far deeps of heaven, that caught and fixed his eye ; it was an awakening consciousness of deep moral wants, that filled his heart with yearning sorrow ; it was a conviction that the name Christian had been hitherto, in his case, a vague sound or hypocritic deception, that touched him with hallowed shame; and it was dumb amazement at the fact that the most sublime instance of love ever exhibited in this universe had been unknown and unheeded by him, which brought him at last, a weeping suppliant, to the Mount of Calvary.

The work he had to accomplish was one of stern difficulty. That long course of noisy vanity had, as it were, deafened and distracted his spiritual nature; fixed thought he found in itself difficult; and now he had to stop and think as with his soul in his hand. Had escape been possible, he would have escaped; for he put himself at first in a firmly defensive attitude, and turned again for a time to the charmers whose spells had hitherto held him. Consider what an outlook was his. By a thousand viewless chains he was bound to the world. Known and adulated in all the clubs and London fashionable circles, rejoicing in a rising fame for eloquence, and having long enjoyed the still more delicious fame of wit, keenly sensitive to every shaft of ridicule, and intensely relishing applause, the strings of his very heart would be rent if he tore himself away; while, hardest of all, he saw clearly that friendships, to his tender nature very dear, must either be cast away altogether, or arrange themselves on new sympathies of a comparatively shallow order. But it was to be done; further he could not go; that flaming sword of God's angel, conscience, barred his way.

In deep trouble of mind, he returned to London. He had abandoned the defensive attitude; he no longer stood as one who could put a face on the matter, and, as it were, prove to God that all was right; he had flung away the armour in which he trusted,—he had exchanged complacency for repentance, defence or apology for earnest prayer. It was not yet light within; but outward duty became plain, and with it he proceeded at once. He wrote to his principal friends, informing them that he was not what he had been; he withdrew his steps from every haunt of worldly mirth; despite a rising feeling of shame, he commenced the worship of God as a householder. He brought himself also, after a severe struggle, to introduce himself to John Newton ; and thus commenced the formation of a new circle of friendship.

At length he began to reap his reward. That peace which has arisen after toil and darkness in so many Christian souls, and which is essentially the same in all,—that peace which came with returning light over the prostrate and trembling soul of Paul,—which brought healing to the agonized heart of Luther,—which was devoutly treasured alike by Cromwell, Edwards, and so far different men as Brainerd and M'Cheyne,—diffused itself at last through the breast of Wilberforce. His testimony was soon decisive that he had reached a higher and more exquisite joy than he had ever known in the saloons of fashion ;—" never so happy in my life as this whole evening," are words from his diary of the period. His correspondence began to breathe the earnestness of Christian zeal and the serenity of Christian enjoyment. "The Eastern nations," he writes to his sister, "had their talismans, which were to advertise them of every danger, and guard them from every mischief. Be the love of Christ our talisman." Again, writing on an Easter Sabbath, "Can my dear sister," he exclaims, "wonder that I call on her to participate in the pleasure I am tasting. I know how you sympathize in the happiness of those you love ; and I could not therefore forgive myself if I were to keep my raptures to myself, and not invite you to partake of my enjoyment. The day has been delightful. I was out before six, and made the fields my oratory, the sun shining as bright and as warm as at midsummer. I think my own devotions become more fervent when offered in this way, amidst the general chorus with which all nature seems on such a morning to be swelling the song of praise and thanksgiving." He had now deliberately devoted himself to Christ, and resolved that all his energies should be dedicated to His service.

It will be well to pause for a moment, that we may learn the precise position of Wilberforce at this juncture, that we may know what Christian conversion had done for him, and estimate the forces at his command for serving his God and his country.

The look he cast over his past life was one of astonishment and sorrow ; his feelings were as those of a man who, after a night of intoxication and revelry, is aroused from a drunken morning sleep to brace on his armour and go instantly to meet the foe ; or of one who finds that, while he has slept, a fair wind has been lost, and the tide is gone far backward, and he will never by utmost diligence make now a good voyage. He was twenty-six years of age. His life, since his twelfth year, had been one course of mental dissipation ; his intellect, naturally alert, had been abandoned to volatility ; he stood appalled, and well-nigh powerless. Had his will been roused to a giant energy,—had he collected all his faculties for one determined struggle,—had he, calculating that, to attain the mental power and material which a true education might at that epoch have realized for him, a space of ten, or at least five years, of stern, unmitigated, silent toil was absolutely required, deliberately given that period to the task, and performed it,—it is impossible to say what he might have been, or what work he might have effected. But he made no such grand effort. Life was so far advanced that he did not dare to withdraw his hand for a moment from work ; he does not seem to have even formed the conception of what was necessary.

Wilberforce, though perhaps the greatest statesman of the century whose character was based upon evangelical principle, cannot be regarded as the Christian statesman of our era. The modern Christian statesman has not yet appeared. For, by statesman, in this august and peculiar sense, must be meant one who exerts so much power in the political world, that the general aspect of affairs is coloured by his influence, the attitude of his country among the kingdoms of the world that which he, at least in a large measure, has appointed. The Christian statesman will be he who can impart to Britain once more the aspect of a great, free, Protestant nation ; who, in the nineteenth century, will bring Christianity into politics, and, helming the State with the strong arm of a Cromwell, make it apparent to all nations that he holds his commission, as governor, from God ; who will gather round him that deep and ancient sympathy with vital Christianity which does exist in these lands, who will combine it with the science and adapt it to the conditions of the time, and make the flag of England once more, not the mere symbol of commercial wealth or military renown, but the standard of Christian civilization.

These words may seem visionary and Utopian. Is it really so ? Have we tacitly come to the conclusion and agreement that Christianity, that Protestantism, is to be permitted indeed to exert what power it can in subordinate spheres, but, in its distinctive character, is no more to be admitted into the councils of nations ? Have we consented that Britain, when dealing with other kingdoms, shall indeed speak, and with resistless power, as a commercial, a military, a colonizing nation, but have no word to say as a Christian nation ? It may be so ; but let us perceive clearly what we imply by the concession. We imply that nations, as such, are exempted from the ordinance of glorifying God ; that, in this important respect, they form an absolute solecism in the universe. Nations must be intended, I say not in what precise way, but at least in their distinctive character, to bear a part in the universal harmony of the universal choir that hymns the Creator's praise. Something more vital than political morality, more nobly human than desire of national wealth, more lofty than martial honour, must one day again penetrate the Senates and Privy Councils of the world. Since the days of Cromwell there has been no leader of the British nation, no Pitt, no Fox, no Wellington, of whom you can say that, as a statesman, he was Christian. Wilberforce was a Christian Member of Parliament ; to a perceptible and blissful extent, he introduced Christianity into the councils of Great Britain ; it is probable that since his day we have retrograded ; but the Christian statesman of the modern epoch he was not.

The power of vital godliness did all for Wilberforce that was, perhaps, without a miracle, possible ; it did not create within him new powers ; it did not convey supernaturally into his mind new and sufficient stores of knowledge ; but it did much.

Light, frivolous, fascinating, Wilberforce made a narrow escape from being a character of a sort which is surely one of the most pitiful human life can show,—a fashionable wit and jester. How profoundly melancholy is the spectacle of a man, the main tenor of whose life is an empty giggle and crackle of fool's laughter ! How ghastly, after it is all past, does the perpetual smirking and smartness of such men as Theodore Hooke appear ! Wilberforce could vie with these in powers of entertaining and being entertained ; his whole training, with one slight exception, tended to foster these powers ; and now they had found their sphere, and passed their probation. His political position was the natural counterpart of that which he occupied in social circles. With powers of natural eloquence which drew unmeasured applause from such men as Burke and Pitt, with great quickness of memory, and, to a certain extent, of arrangement, with a judgment naturally clear and strong, and with a heart which would not swerve from the path of a rough genuine English honour, he had reached a conspicuous station as a supporter of Pitt, and could speak a distinct, independent, and valuable word on most subjects. Yet he records that his political life was then without unity, that he “wanted first principles,” that his own distinction was his “darling object.” His final estimate of this period was nobly stern and true :—“The first years that I was in Parliament I did nothing,—nothing, I mean, to any good purpose.”

Both as man and as politician, he was now changed. The flickering light of vacant and aimless mirth faded from his lip and eye, the sacred energy of Christian purpose began to mould and brighten his features ; if there was still somewhat of restlessness and unsteadied vehemence in his look, it had one point toward which it always turned, and its natural kindness was gradually deepened and sublimed into the holier warmth of Christian love. As a politician, he reached a new independence and individuality. He could no longer wheel round in the circle of party ; he could no longer, even to a limited extent, take his opinions in the mass from the faction to which he belonged ; he told Pitt he would still support him where he could, but that he was no longer to be a party man, even to the same extent as formerly. He looked out for a work of his own, for something which he might do as one whose character was in all things professedly Christian, and who believed that it was as God’s servant alone that he could take a share in the government of Britain. For this work, whatever it might be, he lost no time in preparing himself. He instantly set about the task of concentrating his faculties, and enriching his intellectual stores ; he turned to study with an earnestness he had never hitherto known ; above all, he commenced the careful and uninterrupted study of Holy Writ. His biographers have not erred in considering this last the most important element in his new mental discipline. The power of the Christian Scriptures to engage, to train, and to occupy the intellect, has been attested in express and emphatic terms by such thinkers as Jonathan Edwards and Lessing.

Wilberforce did not wait long ere he found his work. It was twofold. On Sunday, the 28th of October 1787, he wrote these words in his journal: "God Almighty has set before me two great objects, the suppression of the slave trade, and the reformation of manners." With solemn yet courageous earnestness, he assayed these august achievements; he had already counted the forces against him in his public and private Christian walk; after looking them full in the face, this had been his conclusion: "But then we have God and Christ on our side; we have heavenly armour; the crown is everlasting life, and the struggle how short, compared with the eternity which follows it! Yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry."

It is with Wilberforce, in his connection with those two movements, the first of which resulted in the emancipation of the slaves in the British Colonies, and the second of which developed into what is called Exeter Hall philanthropy, that we are primarily concerned. But it were well, if such might be possible, to reach a conclusive estimate at once of the value of the great measures of Abolition of the Slave Trade, and Slave Emancipation, and of the part Christianity bore in their attainment; while the class of kindred phenomena, which are included in the general designation of philanthropic efforts for the reformation of manners, has a special claim upon our notice.

Of the particular method in which Wilberforce led the contest against the Slave Trade, and of the various stages of that contest, it is unnecessary to speak. His task cannot be alleged to have been one of a severity demanding the highest efforts of courage and endurance, or whose performance called forth peculiar heroism. That he did encounter obloquy and scorn, that he did undergo heavy and protracted labour, is certain; that, from year to year, he stood forth with the calm determination of one who had a great work to do, and who would do it with English courage, sagacity, and perseverance, is undeniable ; that, in the whole course of his operations, he earned that substantial applause which is the meed of every man who performs well and completely the duty which he regards himself commissioned of God to accomplish, no one can question. But he deserves no higher honour than this. His sphere of exertion, whatever its inconveniences or occasional troubles, was, on the whole, one of honour and ease ; failure brought no danger or biting disgrace, and from the civilized world voices were raised to cheer and applaud him ; it was worthy and honourable to struggle and conquer as he did, but the fact of his having done so can never be such a testimony to character as similar exertions would have been in the case of a man who worked in the glare of half a world's indignation, and had to contemplate the risk of death.

It was in 1789 that he delivered his first regular speech on the Slave Trade. Even when we have made allowance for the enthusiasm of the moment, we must conclude that the opinions expressed of this performance by Burke and Bishop Porteous prove Wilberforce to have been a man of great natural eloquence, and of rich and vigorous mind. "The House, the nation, and Europe," according to Burke, "were under great and serious obligations to the honourable gentleman for having brought forward the subject in a manner the most masterly, impressive, and eloquent. The principles were so well laid down, and supported with so much force and order, that it equalled anything he had heard in modern times, and was not perhaps to be surpassed in the remains of Grecian eloquence." Porteous styles it "one of the ablest and most eloquent speeches that was ever heard." It lasted three hours. Its effect was to bear the House, with astonishing unanimity, along with the speaker. No additional proof is required that Wilberforce possessed popular talents of a high order. In 1807, after many a galling disappointment, his efforts were crowned with success. The traffic in slaves was declared illegal by the British Parliament. Congratulations poured in upon Wilberforce from all parts of the world ; but while drinking deeply of the joy which rewarded his toil, he abandoned every claim to honour for himself ; all pride was swallowed up in thankfulness. "Oh what thanks do I owe the Giver of all good, for bringing me, in His gracious Providence, to this great cause, which at length, after almost nineteen years' labour, is successful !" These are the words of a true Christian soldier ; their humility and silent earnestness, amid the applause of millions, are beautiful. He lived to see a still greater day. When he retired from political strife, the standard he had so long borne was held aloft by Buxton and others ; with deep emphasis did he again thank God when, in 1833, Britain emancipated her slaves.

Concerning this whole work of Slave Emancipation, we have now heard the two extremes of opinion. For a time, and a long time, it seemed to be a subject on which men were at last agreed ; a universal pæan rose round it, and continued to be chanted on all platforms, in all newspapers, in all schools of rhetoric and poetry. But, after a time, there exhibited itself a disposition to question the advisability and intrinsic excellence of the measures, and at length a strong revulsion of feeling has taken place in certain quarters. Mr Carlyle has poured the chalice of his scorn, comparable to molten iron, on Britain's whole dealing with the negroes of her colonies ; and, wherever his influence is paramount, a disposition to denounce the proceedings of the advocates of abolition and emancipation manifests itself.

The pæans were perhaps struck on too high a key. The stern and numerous difficulties which have since revealed themselves cast no shadow before ; that one grand, all-comprehending difficulty of making men free, implying, as it does, such an elevation of nature, such a raising above sensuality, sloth, and foolishness, into industry, self-respect, and wisdom, as only a Divine hand could at once effect, was not then apprehended ; it did not strike men that, if they destroyed Sodom, they might have in its place a Dead Sea. But the plaudits had more reason in them than the denunciations. There is something wholesome and inspiring in the sound of human rejoicing over wrong and iniquity even believed to be overthrown ; on the other side, the vituperation, when all is well looked into, turns out to have little more on which to support itself than the old fact, whose truth we must so often acknowledge and put up with, that human affairs are not ideal, that human intellects are bounded. It might be possible to strike the truth between the opposing views.

Slave Emancipation, of which the abolition of the Slave Trade may be considered a part, was a great initial measure, which did not exhaust the case, which did not even proceed far with it, which cannot be said to have touched certain of its greatest and most strictly original difficulties, but which cleared the ground for its discussion, fixed the imperative conditions of the problem, and laid down the fundamental axioms by which it must be solved. It cleared the atmosphere round the whole subject ; its very excess, if such there was, the very fact of its abstaining from any tempering or temporising expedients, but attempting to break, as by one sledge-hammer blow, the chain of slavery, made its teaching of certain great principles the more emphatic.

The first great truth it declared was none other than that of which something has been already said, and on which it is needless here again to enlarge : That an essential equality subsists among the members of the human family. It was the second great assertion by Christian Philanthropy of this fundamental principle : Howard's work in the prisons of the world was the first.

Slavery, in its essential nature, is precisely that which puts man individually in the stead of God, as the ultimate source of authority regarding a human being. Hence is at once obvious the error of those who, pointing to the subordination of class to class, and such other arrangements of society as restrain and circumvent every man in every sphere, exclaim that slavery cannot be abolished. From the laws of society, in some form or other, we cannot escape ; but, whatever its imperfections, society must be regarded as originally an ordinance of God, enforced by a necessity of nature, and, with whatever subordinate disadvantages and difficulties, conducing towards the very highest and noblest results for the individual and the race. No man, therefore, is a slave, however hard he toils, however ill he fares, in simply conforming to its legitimate ordinances. But whatever negatives the action of the powers with which God has gifted a man, and which he holds from Him, is of the nature of slavery ; every social imperfection involving injustice and partiality, is more or less allied to it ; and when a man is bought and sold as a chattel or animal, and the action of those powers may altogether be negatived, we have its darkest and most accurate type.

The second lesson which these legislative measures read to the world was this : That Mammon was not the ultimate authority in this question ; that, though the pecuniary loss were of indefinite amount, there were other considerations, of justice and humanity, which could overtop them, and that infinitely. It was as if Mammon and Justice had been pitted against each other, with the world for an arena : Mammon pointed to these souls of men, said they represented gold, and declared that the smoke of their torment would blacken the dome of heaven ere he let them from beneath his sway : Justice flung to him twenty millions, and bade him, with a contemptuous smile, relax his hold. By whatever law the questions connected with the Negro race were to be ultimately settled, it was not to be a consideration in the case, how they would realize the greatest pecuniary profit for white men ; the general principle was emphatically enounced, that, whatever of wealth or luxury a man may extract from any portion of the earth, by making his fellow-man the tool for its attainment, this method is essentially unjust, and on no conceivable hypothesis to be defended.

There has been not a little discussion as to the respective exertions of Clarkson, Wilberforce, and others, in the attainment of their common object. To this controversy there shall here be contributed not one word. We saw that Wilberforce accepted, as part of the work appointed him by God, the conduct of the struggle for the abolition ; and we saw him, when the Slave Trade was no more, devoutly thanking God for having honoured him to bear his part in the work. But, in what shares soever the trophies of the victory be distributed to individuals, it is just to claim the whole achievement as a triumph for Christianity. Ramsay, whose book, published towards the close of last century, was the prelude to the agitation, was a Christian pastor ; Clarkson and Wilberforce both toiled under the direct commission of Christian love. To such an extent Christianity did colour our national counsels. In the former century, the love of the gospel had shed its mild light in the dungeon ; it now spoke an emphatic word against slavery,—a word which, however little it may have yet availed, will assuredly not die away until that foul stain of shame and guilt is wiped from the brow of humanity. All that was of real value in the measure was its testimony, on the part of the first nation in the world, to justice and love : that testimony was priceless ; and it was the might of Christianity which drew it forth. Every noble mind, every heart touched with poetic fire or raised by philosophic ardour, hailed it with instant and exultant applause. Cowper, Coleridge, Byron, Schlegel, Fichte, and a list of such, embracing, with probably not a solitary exception, all the greatness and nobleness of the close of last century and the commencement of this, declared Slave Emancipation to be a high and glorious aim and achievement ; Mr Carlyle was, so far as I know, the very first man of genius and nobleness, both unquestioned, to hint a doubt regarding the fundamental principles which animated Clarkson and Wilberforce. And whatever scorn or gratuitous insulting pity may accompany her path, it is an auspicious omen, that the form in which Christianity has walked forth most prominently in the sight of nations in these latter ages has again been that of love ; she is about her natural and peculiar work when she brings hope to the prisoner and freedom to the slave.

We arrive now at the second portion of that twofold task which Wilberforce believed to be appointed him by God. This was the reformation of manners. The method to be adopted was that of public exposure and philanthropic appeal. The force of Christian love, scattered in countless bosoms in the British Islands, was to become, as it were, conscious of itself, to gather together and unite : when this was accomplished, it was to turn in concentrated power against evil, in whatever form and place it appeared, either by bringing its influence to bear directly on the Legislature, or by local and personal endeavours. The efforts of Wilberforce in this province mark the commencement of the second stage of philanthropy ; the fire was to spread wide, and the attempt was to be made to give it form and union.

The part played by Wilberforce, in connection with this extension of the philanthropic movement, can be easily defined and comprehended. Wherever there germinated a scheme of benevolence, he cast on it a glance of encouragement ; whoever designed, by voluntary efforts on the part of himself and his fellows, to benefit any part of the human race, looked towards Wilberforce, nor looked in vain. But, after all, he was rather the principal worker in philanthropy, than its organizing, ordering, compelling chief ; for him we still wait. To discern, by far-reaching and unerring glance, the real force and the real perils of this wide-spread benevolence, this many-worded spirit of kindness, that gathered its assemblies and spoke on its platforms ; to connect it, as a phenomenon, with the characteristics of our age ; to be a head to its great throbbing heart, an eye to its hundred, earth-embracing hands, was not given to Wilberforce. Philanthropy, under him, was aptly and expressively emblemed by that motley throng which Sir James Stephen so graphically depicts swarming in the chambers of his house ; a number of living and embodied forces, some of whim, some of folly, some of mere maudlin softness, all inclined to do good, and complacently concluding that good intentions would pass for substantial working power. But it was no slight or profitless work which Wilberforce did. Unless you know how to direct your motive power, you will do no work ; but unless you have your motive power, you are in a still more hopeless case. He, and the right-hearted men who were around him, fanned into a flame which covered Britain, that spirit of active love which Howard evoked. To consider it open to discussion whether this service was of value, seems to be to deny every instinct man feels, every rule by which he acts. If a man says that it is not a consoling, an auspicious fact, that in a million breasts there is awakened the will, the bare will, to work and war for the diffusion of light over our world, for the social and moral amelioration of men, I know not how to answer him. If a man, contemplating the grand temptation which, by necessity of position, assails Britain in these ages, the temptation to circumscribe, so to speak, the blue vault by an iron grating, and beneath it, as in a temple, to kneel before the shrine of Mammon, finds no healing, counteracting influence in the spectacle of thousands of British hands stretched out to take Mammon's gold and lay it on a higher altar, I cannot assail, as I cannot conceive, his position. If any one does not perceive that there is an infinite difference between a nation, slothful and avaricious, that will do and give nothing in the cause of God and humanity, and a nation saying, "I will give, I will act, and if I know not how, I will earnestly hear," I can merely signify dumb astonishment. Had philanthropy hitherto done nothing, its presence in the world would still be a blessing as of the early rain ; if it has in certain directions fallen into error, it is both a commonplace and a fatal mistake to cast away good with evil ; an error not committed, save by madmen, in other departments, for you do not cast away your sword for its rust, or your scythe because it is not hung with perfect scientific accuracy. But philanthropy, Exeter Hall Philanthropy, has done much. It has alleviated the woes of factory children, it has erected ragged schools, provided shelter for the houseless, food for the starving ; it has sown the world with Bibles. Since the day when Howard called it forth, as a power distinctly to be seen and felt in human affairs, its progress has been one before which oppression has fallen, its step has startled cruelty and crime. God has honoured it hitherto, and He will bless it still.

But however well it may be to express this plain truth, and however lawful to draw encouragement therefrom, it is of more strict practical avail to clear the way for future work, than to rejoice over what has been done. A few remarks bearing on the operations of philanthropy may therefore be submitted to the reader.

First of all, it must be clearly and definitely understood what this wide-spread benevolence, considered as an operative agency, actually is. Emotion of every sort, all that portion, so to speak, of the mind which generates action, is simply a force ; whether it does good or evil, depends entirely on how it is directed. Steam lies for ages unknown as a moving power ; then for ages it is used merely in mines and coal-pits ; at last it unites all lands by its iron highways, quickening the pulse of the world, and making man finally victorious over every element. The tenderest pity, the most ardent love, can never be aught but a steam-power ; you must know precisely how to use it, or it steads you not. Nay, such a thing is possible as that the force should do evil instead of good. In Hannibal's army at Zama, the elephants were turned back upon his own troops ; it would have been better if he had had no elephants.

This is a principle which, when stated in terms, no one will contest ; but it is of vital importance, and is very apt to be practically lost sight of. The excellence of a man's sentiment is apt to cast a delusive brightness over his thought ; when we listen to one whom we know to be a good man, the fervour of whose spirit delights and inspires, we feel it a thankless and ungrateful task to bring his schemes under the dry light of reason, and to tell him they are naught. Yet, when we come into contact with fact and reality, emotion goes for nothing ; good intention is whiffed aside ; no music of applause, no gilding of oratory, will keep the sinking ship afloat ; it settles down like a mere leaky cask. Philanthropists must learn to look deeper than the first aspect of a project, to examine its ulterior bearings, to see how it allies itself with social laws ; they must accustom themselves to resist the soft charm of plausible eloquence, to examine the bare truth advocated, and to discern and accept this truth when recommended by no eloquence, and scarcely caught from stammering lips.

In the next place, it cannot be too often or too emphatically insisted on, that philanthropy should clear its eyesight by acquaintance with that science which has for its object the laws of the social system. Since all human affairs are inextricably interwoven, no man can rightfully hold himself entitled to put his hand to any part of the social fabric, without knowing how his act will affect other parts. There are only two possible hypotheses on which the science of the social system can be attacked : that there are no laws in economic and social matters, or that they are so profoundly mysterious, that an attempt to know them is prima facie absurd. The first, no one, since the days of Bacon, would maintain. The second might be urged with some faint show of reason. The freaks of individual will are countless ; the soul of man is the one thing, of all we know, which comes nearest to giving us the idea of infinitude. But it is assuredly true, on the other hand, that there are certain great laws which may be discerned acting in man's life from age to age, and that their general action may be traced and depended on. Political economy can be attacked by no arguments which do not militate, more or less, against science in general ; and to answer an argument levelled against modern science, would be giving a sufficient reason to every reader to close the book. Philanthropy ought more and more to ally itself with social science, and the happiest results may be looked for from the union.

Once more, and with reference to the practical working of Philanthropy, it must be remembered that the secret of success in every undertaking is, under the Divine blessing, to get men to do it. The whole might of Mr Carlyle's genius has been bent to the proclamation of one great truth,—the sumless worth of a man. Everything else is dead. Constitutions of absolute theoretic perfection, laws of faultless equity, riches and armies beyond computation, will be of themselves of no avail ; men may put fire into these, but these will never fill the place of men. The operations of the Bible Society have given the most emphatic confirmation to Mr Carlyle's words on this point ever furnished in the history of the world, or possibly to be furnished. They have afforded one other proof that it is by man God will convert the world ; the Bible itself, when alone, has not supplied the want. Here is the difficulty of difficulties. You can get gold by subscription ; but a man of real power, of piety, faculty, energy, cannot be subscribed for. It is by the sagacious, powerful man, that the man of power is known ; imbecility, seated on a mountain of gold, can do nothing here. And yet, till you get your men, nothing is done : if you give your gold to bad or incompetent men, it were better that you flung it into the Thames. It must be fixed as an axiom in the heart of every philanthropist and of every philanthropic society, that this is the point on which success or failure absolutely depends. It must be fairly comprehended that it cannot be attained by mere examining of reports, or any other mechanical process, although each of these may contribute its aid. Not for a moment is it to be forgotten that it must be done. If all the men employed by philanthropy in its unnumbered schemes were godly, earnest, and able men, what a power for good were then acting in our country and to the ends of the earth !

These suggestions are to be looked upon in the light of finger-posts, indicating the way towards comprehensive reform, rather than unfolding the methods of such. If it is a noble and effective form of exertion which arises from union, sympathy, and the power of moral suasion, let us recognise and honour the great movement of Christian philanthropy. If pestilent babblers will endeavour to possess our platforms, and to substitute ignorance and sentimentality for knowledge and manly compassion, let men of real power, by the might of those clear, strong words, which an English audience loves, strike them into harmless silence or benignant shame. If it is a fact, so boldly written on the forehead of our age that its denial is an absurdity, and so firmly impressed upon our modern forms of life that its alteration were an attempt to hide the steam-engine, to bury the press, to raze from the annals of man the French Revolution, that the voice of public opinion, whether right or wrong, does now rule Great Britain, let no true, and bold, and earnest man disdain to speak into the public ear by those channels which determine the sound of that voice. Let Exeter Hall stand ; shut no door where men are wont to assemble to listen to men ; but let every one who listens there scrutinize and judge in the awe of a fearful responsibility, and let every one speak as before God. When one surveys society in our days, and lays to heart how it is guided, he does not fail to learn that the task of speaking words to a human assemblage at present is as the task of holding the lightnings.

The conduct of the opposition to the Slave Trade, and the perpetual promotion and superintendence of philanthropic operations, were those aspects of the life of Wilberforce which first caught the eye, and stood out most boldly to the public gaze. Yet perhaps it is by somewhat altering our point of view that we gain a full and clear comprehension at once of the character in which he really was most serviceable to his country, of the fountain whence each separate stream of his activity flowed, and of the highest lesson his walk conveys. Regard him solely in his capacity as a Christian man ; look upon him as he moves in the circles of Parliamentary ambition,—in the full influence of that icy glitter which is the light and the warmth of those high regions. You then see how living Christianity, unassisted by the might of talent, can bear itself in the midst of political excitement and intrigue ; you may then judge whether those ancient arms, the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, have lost their heavenly temper.

You find that during his whole life these never fail him. From fashion, and its loud pretence of joy, he turns aside ; the atmosphere of faction is too foul for his purified organs ;

holding by the standard of truth and godliness alone, he becomes himself a party. In a region unseen by the world, in the stillness of the closet, where only the All-seeing Eye is upon him, he lays open the recesses of his soul, that Divine light may penetrate and pervade its every chamber ; there, on his knees before God, he laments for secret sins, and pleads for holiness in his inner life ; he looks earnestly and with severe honesty within, searching his heart with the Word of God as with a candle, that there may lurk in it no thought or feeling to exalt itself against the Most High. He then goes into Parliament and the world. By the gleam of the gold it is seen that it has been purified by celestial fire ; his light shines before men ; they acknowledge it to be a steadfast flame, untainted by the dim atmosphere in which it glows, and ever pointed to heaven ; they are compelled to glorify the God whom he serves. He embodies the simple might of goodness,—the serene majesty of light. He shows what that politician has won whose political scheme is briefly this, that he will follow the Lord fully ; and proves what a rectifying, healing, irradiating power in human affairs is the awakened and vivid consciousness of immediate relationship to the Creator. He touches every question with the Ithuriel spear of Christian truth ; and the falsehood in it starts forth, as by irresistible compulsion, in its own image. And so, where the subject suggests doubt, where soft folds of plausibility are drawn over moral delinquency, or the shifting meteor of expediency offers itself for the pole-star of duty, men turn to Wilberforce : look on this, they say, with your eye : we believe it has been purified by a light Divine.

To trace the phases in which this distinctive godliness manifested itself in his Parliamentary career, and to exhibit the testimonies given to its heavenly virtue by the men with whom he worked, were to detail his actings from his twenty-sixth year. One instance must serve for a thousand.

We have all heard of the impeachment of Melville. Of his perfect innocence, or partial delinquency, this is not the place to speak. However it was, the case was one of profound interest in Parliament; and Ministers were extremely anxious to screen him. Wilberforce was doubly impelled to come to a conclusion favourable to him. His heart was naturally of a delicately tender and kindly order, and his old friend Pitt had set his heart on clearing Melville. He examined the matter, but could not suppress the consciousness of grave doubts. He listened eagerly to the explanations offered by Ministers, when the discussion came on in Parliament; looking into them with the piercing flash of English shrewdness, quickened by godly earnestness, he saw, or thought he saw, through them: he hesitated not a moment, but rose to his feet. The eye of Pitt was on him, with the pleading of affection, and the authority of one deeply esteemed: Wilberforce felt the fascination of the look. But he faltered not: he spoke the bold, unmeasured words of Christian honour; he went against Ministers, and condemned Melville. His words fell on an attentive house; the number of votes he influenced was named at forty; Ministers were defeated. It was felt that in a question of simple integrity, where casuistry had to be eluded, and plausibility swept aside, Wilberforce was the ultimate authority. In the British Senate in the nineteenth century, when a point of morality had to be settled, it was not to the man of poor duelling "honour," it was not to the philosophic moralist, it was not to the upright merchant, men looked for a decision: it was to the Christian Senator, whose code was his Bible, and who walked, in child-like simplicity, by the old conversion light. Consider the number of opinions represented in that assembly, and then estimate the weight and worth of this testimony.

Thus did Wilberforce, in his station in public affairs, conspicuously manifest to men the fresh and prevailing power of living Christianity, and testify its superiority to every other light. The book which he published was just the same testimony expressed in words. To criticise, however briefly, the View of Practical Christianity, would be now out of date. It was marked by no peculiar traits of genius, by no originality of thought or style. But it was clear, explicit, warm, and animated ; over it all there breathed the fervour of love and the earnestness of faith ; it was an attempt to urge the pure gospel on the fashionable and worldly, and hold it, to use Milton's superb language, in their faces like a mirror of diamond, that it might dazzle and pierce their misty eyeballs. And mankind did consent to listen to its pleading ; it went round the world : very few books have been so widely popular. It was published in 1797.

The domestic life of Wilberforce was of that happy sort which defies long description. It can be but in rare cases that the description of the course of a river, if given mile by mile, is interesting ; even Wordsworth cannot persuade us to trace with him, more than once, the course of that Duddon at whose every winding he has erected a mile-stone in form of a sonnet. The river rose among green craggy mountains ; in its joyful youth, it was the playmate of sunbeams ; the dimpling, wavering, sparkling child, that dallied with the zephyrs, or leaped over the precipice, wreathing its snowy neck in rainbows ; as if in the strength of youth and manhood, it flowed long through a bounteous and lordly campaign of cornfield and woodland, resting calmly in the noon-day sun, listening to the reaper's song ; it widened into a peaceful estuary, its force becoming ever less, and, in a silent balmy evening, it lost itself in a placid ocean. This is all we care to know about the river. Much the same is it in a case like that before us. Wilberforce's boyhood, manhood, and old age, are well enough conceived by reference to this common figure.

At the age of thirty-eight he married. His was a happy family ; and a congeniality in the highest tastes bound him in sympathizing affection to his wife. In the arm-chair, or at the festal board, he was seen to the greatest advantage. By reading what he has left us, we can evidently form no idea of what he was either in Parliament or in his home. He expressly tells us that he did not succeed with his pen ; that the quickening excitement of society, the genial impulse of speech, caused his ideas to start forth in more vivid colours, in quicker and more natural sequence : and the particular power of the orator and of the wit partakes so much of the nature of a flavour,—of an undefined and incommunicable essence,—that a fame in that sort must always depend mainly on testimony. A witticism without the glance that lent it fire is often the dew-pearl without its gleam,—a mere drop of water. But it cannot be doubted for a moment that the social powers of Wilberforce were of an extraordinary order. The two qualities whose combination gives probably the most engaging manner possible, are tenderness and quick sympathy ; the instantaneous apprehension of what is said, and its reception into the arms of a tender, sympathizing interest. Wilberforce had both. His heart was very tender. To go from the country to the town would affect him to tears. When John Wesley stood up and gave him his blessing, he wept. We have seen how he delivered his testimony against Melville : hear now how they afterwards met. The account of the interview will be best given in Wilberforce's own words : “We did not meet for a long time, and all his connections most violently abused me. About a year before he died, we met in the stone passage which leads from the Horse Guards to the Treasury. We came suddenly upon each other, just in the open air, where the light struck upon our faces. We saw one another ; and at first I thought he was passing on, but he stopped and called out, ‘ Ah, Wilberforce, how do you do?' and gave me a hearty shake by the hand. I would have given a thousand pounds for that shake." A generous and tender nature speaks in this last expression. For everything in nature or man he had a glance of sympathy; provided always it lay in the sunlight,—provided it had no guilt or baseness in it.

It is easy to present Wilberforce to the eye of imagination, as he used to appear when seated in his arm-chair, the centre of a pleased and mirthful throng. Diminutive in size, with features spare and sharp, with vivid, sparkling eye, he does not rest, but has a tendency to jerk and fidget; his face is piquant, mobile, varying in its lights and shades, like a lake in a sunny, breezy April day. An idea is suggested by some one of the company; a slight twinkle, an instantaneous change of light in his eye, shows he has caught it, and embraced it, and looked round and round it; he tosses it about, as if from hands full of gold dust, till in a few moments it is wrapped in new light and gilding,—or he playfully transfixes it on the unpoisoned dart of a light, genial banter, shrewd and arch, which finds its way straight to the heart,—or his face grows solemn, and he utters, unostentatiously but earnestly, a few devout words regarding it. Now his face is one free, indefinite, joyful smile,—now he mimics some parliamentary orator,—now he is giving some graphic, faintly caustic sketch of character, with a sharp catching smile about his lip,—and now he listens quietly, a tear in his eye. Sir James Stephen, who doubtless was intimately acquainted with Wilberforce, compares his vivacity to Voltaire's, and sets his tenderness above that of Rousseau: Madame de Staël pronounced him the wittiest man in England. But perhaps the most entirely satisfactory and expressive idea of his whole manner to be possibly reached is to be found in these words of Mackintosh, who visited him when advanced in life: "Do you remember Madame de Maintenon's exclamation, 'Oh, the misery of having to amuse an old king, qui n'est pas amusable !' Now, if I were called to describe Wilberforce in one word, I should say he was the most 'amusable' man I ever met with in my life. Instead of having to think what subjects will interest him, it is perfectly impossible to hit on one that does not. I never saw any one who touched life at so many points ; and this is the more remarkable in a man who is supposed to live absorbed in the contemplation of a future state. When he was in the House of Commons, he seemed to have the freshest mind of any man there. There was all the charm of youth about him. And he is quite as remarkable in this bright evening of his days, as when I saw him in his glory many years ago."

The concluding years of his life were calm and beautiful. He spent them at his country residence of Highwood. More and more his eye turned towards the home he was now nearing ; through his vivacity,—through his still fresh activity,—there shone more and more the softening, mellowing light of holiness. He loved to expatiate under the open sky, to watch the dew-drops, to gaze long and with unsated delight upon flowers, the rising gratitude and delight of his soul flowing forth in the words in which King David voiced similar feelings on the battlements of Zion three thousand years ago. "Surely," he would say, "flowers are the smiles of God's goodness."

In 1832 he passed tranquilly into his rest.

Richly gifted by nature, Wilberforce never repaired the waste and dissipation of his faculties in those years when a man ought to be undergoing a serious and methodic education. The mighty intellectual powers were not his ; the strength of far-reaching, penetrating thought, the comprehensive and ordered memory, the imagination of inevitable eye and creative hand. Unless that perpetual glow of feeling, that free and exuberant fertility of wit, that natural power of eloquence and acting, which he possessed, come within the strained limits of a definition of genius, he certainly had none. But in the evening of his days he could look over his life, and recall the hour when he had devoted himself to his Saviour, and thank God, without hypocrisy, that he had been enabled in measure to perform his vow. His life was not ineffective or dark ; it was spent in the noblest manner in which a man can live, in advancing the glory of earth's eternal King, by blessing that creature man whom He has appointed its king in time ; and over it there lies Divine grace, uniting, harmonizing, beautifying all, like the bow of God's covenant.

SAMUEL BUDGETT.

WHAT is that one point in which nature surpasses all novelists and depictees of character, and by their relative approach to which, all such are to be ranked, from Shakspeare downwards? It is the union of variety with consistency. To draw the man of one idea is easy. You have but to represent him, in all circumstances however distracting, with his thoughts running in one channel; on all occasions however irrelevant, introducing his favourite topic; and, unseduced by any evils incurred or benefits foregone, spending health and wealth in the indulgence of his propensity. Don Quixote, Mr Shandy, and Uncle Toby, are models in this sort. To draw the man who is a bundle of inconsistencies is also easy: to attain this, you have simply to pay no attention to what your character, as an individual, should either say or do, putting your own opinions on all subjects into his mouth, and always exacting from him the heroism to abandon his own individuality, to contradict himself in opinion and action, in order to advance your plot, or bring you out of a difficulty. Now, nature never produces a man whose whole existence is the pursuit or embodiment of one idea, although she comes very near it. For the most part, her way is to give men a large variety of qualities, opinions, powers. The man of absolute inconsistency she never produces at all. Her inimitable skill is shown in the delicate graduation and adjustment of powers, so that they can live at peace in one bosom, and the man be a single personal identity. As she has struck a beautiful harmony in the senses, so that in their variety they result in unity, so does she unite variety with unity in the individual character ; her men are not single lines, nor does she piece together contradictions ; weakness and strength in action, unless each is fitful, warmth and coldness of heart, clearness and obscurity of intellect, generosity and niggardliness of disposition, never co-exist. This is a point of importance both in criticism and biography. Lord Macaulay and Sir James Stephen have noted nature's variety ; but the whole truth of her variety in consistency may not have been so distinctly noted. Shylock, cited by Lord Macaulay, shows indeed many passions ; but they are of a household ; they have all a gloomy and obdurate scowl : hatred, revenge, avarice, fanaticism, darken his brow and eye ; but they admit no alien gleam from love, forgiveness, or generosity : he is just such a character as nature would produce, and as he who held the mirror up to nature could paint. So it is in every other case instanced by Lord Macaulay, and so it must always be in nature. To expound fully, and apply the principle, might make a valuable chapter in criticism. But biography, and not criticism, is the present business. The dramatist or novelist and the biographer differ in this : the former have for their aim to attain, amid diversity, a natural harmony ; the latter has nature's unity given, and his task is to show how its variations cohere and are consistent. When, after fair scrutiny, you find a character, in a novel or drama, acting inconsistently, decide that the author is so far incompetent ; when you see a man in life acting in a manner which appears to you contradictory, conclude you do not understand him.

About the beginning of this century there was, at the village school of Kimmersden, near Coleford, in Somersetshire, a boy about ten years of age. He had been born at Wrington, another Somersetshire village, in 1794, of poor shop-keeping people, who seem to have been hard put to it to find a livelihood ; for they went from village to village seeking a sure though humble maintenance ; and it was only after many a shift that they opened a little general shop in Coleford. The boy was in some respects distinguished from his fellows. One day he picked up a horse-shoe, went with it three miles, and got a penny for it. He managed to lay together one or two other pennies, and commenced trading among his school-fellows. Lozenges, marbles, and so forth, were his wares. He sold to advantage, and his capital increased. By calculation on the prices charged in the shops, by buying in large and selling in small quantities, by never losing an opportunity or wasting a penny, by watching for bargains and stiffly insisting on adherence to their terms, he laid shilling to shilling, and pound to pound, until, at the age of fifteen, he was master of thirty pounds sterling. The spectacle cannot be called pleasing. A boy, whose feelings should have shared in the exuberance and free generosity of youth, converted into a premature skinflint and save-all ; the frosty prudence of life's autumn crisping and killing the young leaflets and blossoms of life's spring ; a rivulet in the mountains already banked and set to turn a mill ;—surely the less we hear of such a boy the better : was he born with a multiplication table in his mouth ? This boy's name was Samuel Budgett.

A touch of romance is a salutary ingredient in character ; in boyhood and youth it is particularly charming ; but there is a possibility that it may go too far ; and a sentimental, tearful child, who is always giving some manifestation of the finer feelings, borders on the intolerable. There was at this same Kimmersden school (even in village schools variety of character will come out) a boy who seemed to be somewhat of this sort. When a little money came into his possession, he bought Wesley's Hymns, and of a summer evening you might have seen him walking in the fields, reciting his favourite pieces with intense enjoyment. His mother was once dangerously ill, and his father sent him on horseback, in the night, for medical assistance. As he rode back, in the breaking morning, he heard a bird sing in a park by the wayside ; he listened in strange delight, and seemed to receive some tidings from the carol. On reaching home, he went to his sister, and gravely informed her that he knew their mother would recover, that God had answered his prayers on her account, and that this had become known to him as he heard a little bird sing in Mells Park that morning. Not one boy in a thousand would have marked that bird's song. On another day you might have observed him coming along a lane on horseback : as you looked, you saw that he was not thinking of his horse or his way ; his eyes had an abstracted look, though animated and filled with tears ; the bridle had fallen from his hand, and his horse was quietly eating grass. He was at the moment in reverie ; he was dreaming himself a missionary in far lands ; and the tears streamed down his cheeks as he knelt among tropical bushes, under a southern sun, to implore blessing on the household he had left at home. Such was the sentimental scholar of Kimmersden. And what was his name ? Samuel Budgett !

Nature had framed no contradiction. The boy's heart was tenderly affectionate, his nature keenly sensitive, his sympathies rich, kindly, poetic ; but his young eyes had seen nothing but struggle and penury in his father's house ; he had learned, by natural shrewdness and happy occasion, the lesson of thrift ; he had a brain as clear and inventive as his heart was warm ; by accident or otherwise, the pleasurable exercise of his faculties in that juvenile trading commenced, and with the relish of a born merchant he followed the game.

The money itself was little more to him than the pieces are to a born chess-player ; its accumulation merely testified that all worked well. The coalescence and relative position of the two sets of qualities were sometimes finely shown. He wasted no money, yet he lost no time in buying Wesley's Hymns. He amassed thirty pounds in a few years of boyish trading, but when the sum was complete, he gave it all to his parents.

Having finally decided to be a merchant, and adopting it as his ambition to raise his family to tolerably affluent circumstances, Budgett was apprenticed, at the age of fifteen, to an elder brother, who had a shop in Kingswood, a village four miles from Bristol. His education, now formally completed, had, in all relating to books, been meagre enough. He had learned to read, write, and to some extent cipher ; no more. In other respects it had been more thorough. He had already, in his boyish mercantile operations, served an apprenticeship to clearness of head, promptitude and firmness in action ; his father's house had been a school of rare excellence ; so rare, that, on the whole, flinging in Pocklington Academy, and St John's College, Oxford, and the Gallery of the House of Commons, into the opposite scale, it may still be pronounced superior to that of Wilberforce. In that house he saw honesty, industry, determination, and godliness ; he saw how severe the struggle for existence sometimes is ; he saw how faculties must be worked in order to their effective exercise. Of special importance was that portion of his education which consisted in the influence of his mother's godliness. He was still a child of nine, when he happened one day to saunter past her room. The door was shut, and he heard her voice. She was engaged in prayer, and the subject of her petitions was her family. He heard his own name. His heart was at once touched, and from that moment it turned towards heaven. Surely a beautiful family incident. The heart of that mother was probably heavy at the moment, her eyes perhaps filled with tears ; yet God heard her, and on herself was bestowed the angelic office of answering her own prayer. Samuel Budgett went to apprenticeship from his father's house, a steady, kindly, radically able, and religious youth.

His apprenticeship was not such as to permit his habits of perseverant industry to be broken or to relax. He was at the counter by six in the morning ; "and nine, ten, or eleven at night," were the ordinary hours of closing. The toil he underwent was such that he used to speak of it till the close of his life. He was of small strength, and little for his years ; the exertion of the grocer's business was doubtless too much for him. He soon became a favourite with customers, his manner was so unaffectedly kind, his attention so close and uniform. It is interesting also to observe the keen thirst for knowledge which he displayed during those years. If he heard a sermon, he treasured it up like a string of pearls, and adjourned at its close to some sequestered place, to con it over, and lay it up in his inmost heart. What books came in his way he eagerly devoured ; for poetry he showed a keen relish, and committed large portions to memory. He exclaims, almost in anguish, "O wisdom ! O knowledge !—the very expressions convey ideas so delightful to my mind, that I am ready to leap out and fly ; for why should my ideas always be confined within the narrow compass of our shop walls ?" A shop-boy with so genuine and fixed an aspiration after knowledge will scarce fail to find education. The power to act nobly and effectively may exist with little book knowledge : to know living men, to have sat long under the stern but thorough teaching of experience, to have a sympathy open to the unnumbered influences of exhaustless and ever-healthful nature, may set a man above those who have studied all things at second-hand, as seen through other eyes, and represented by feeble human speech. Budgett had the faculty to work well ; he was acquiring a thorough knowledge of men, and a power to measure them at a glance ; he loved the open fields and skies, the summer woods and the river bank, and every smile and frown on the face of what the ancients well called our Mother Earth. About the time when his apprenticeship closed, in August 1816, he wrote thus to a friend :—"As it respects my coming to Frome, I thank you for your kind invitation. I have intended going ; but I assure you, when it comes to the point I have no inclination to go anywhere ; for, if I cannot find happiness at home, it is in vain to seek it anywhere else. I think if I were to come with the determination to enjoy the company of my friends, by going to any places of recreation or amusement, though I am very fond of such kind of engagements, particularly where religion and real happiness is the subject of conversation, yet it may tend rather to divert my mind from God as the source of my happiness, than unite it to him. But for one thing I have long felt an earnest though secret desire ; which is, to spend a little time with you and Mr T—— alone, where no object but God could attract our attention ; that we may, by devout conversation, by humble, fervent, faithful prayer, get our souls united to each other, and to God our living Head, by the strongest ties of love and affection." The young man who writes thus from behind a grocer's counter has pretty well supplied the defects of his education ; in important respects he is educated. The idea of the last sentence is that of the noblest possible friendship : we can look for no fairer spectacle than that of those three friends kneeling before God, that the celestial bond of a common love for Him may knit their hearts.

After serving for three years with a salary, on the expiration of his seven years' apprenticeship, Budgett was taken into partnership by his brother.

He feels now that he has got a firm footing, that a spot has been found in the world on which he may live and work. He prepares himself for the future accordingly. A pleasant little background of romance suddenly beams out upon us. We find that long ago—"very early"—he had fallen in love with a certain Miss Smith of Midsomer-Norton. His little touch of originality had been manifested here too ; he had ventured to admit hope into his heart to this serious extent ; he had dared to permit imagination to paint, in clear hues and with a flush of sunlight over its front, a snug pretty little cottage on his horizon, with one waiting at its threshold who to him seemed heavenly fair ; during all his toil in that dismal prosaic shop from morning to night, he could see in the distance that angelic figure smiling him on. He had now reached that little cottage ; from the faint though beautifully-tinted work of a dream, it had changed into solid brick,—a decided improvement : he married Miss Smith, and turned to face life with the heart of a man. He was now twenty-five years of age.

Let us for a moment contemplate the sphere in which Samuel Budgett commences work for himself. His sphere is not imposing ; it is a retail shop in the grocery business, in the village of Kingswood, four miles from Bristol. His brother is a respectable, industrious, plodding man, who has prospered hitherto according to his ambition, and dreams not of any change. There seems but little room for advancement, little scope for talent ; one can but buy and sell like one's neighbours, and live as heretofore ; at all events, the field is open and level to all. Mercantile wealth and honour are, indeed, the possible prizes ; but that a village shop should ever come into competition with any great establishment,—with those of Bristol, for instance,—appears never to have occurred to any one. Samuel Budgett's prospects are such as one may have in a village grocery.

The new partner is found to have ways of his own, which,

in this establishment, are regarded as new-fangled, or even officious. His brother casts a glance of indifference, or even dislike, upon his proposals and proceedings ; only after a time, and as the commanding talent of Samuel becomes more plain, does he fairly throw the reins into his hands. Budgett acts in the way natural to him. It may be briefly characterized thus : he does, with perfect accuracy and thoroughness, what lies to hand,—what is ordinary and established in the routine of business,—and he has always, besides, a sure and piercing glance ahead and around. Here perhaps lies the precise point of difference between the accurate, methodic man, who will conserve all, but make no advancement, and the man who will step onward ; both are thorough workers, but the one has no originality, no instinct of improvement, no healthful, intelligent audacity ; while the other has. The blundering man, again, the man whose boldness and originality are not so fitly those of manhood as of youth, looks only, or principally, forwards ; he devotes not sufficient time and energy to the ground already won ; he will set off in foolish pursuit while a body of the enemy is yet unbroken on the field. The man who will make real progress never neglects the business of the moment, but he looks forward too ; he ventures, on the right occasion, in the strength and self-reliance of talent, to break through sanctioned rules, and shape new ones for himself. The truly and healthfully original man is not he who recklessly gambles, appealing from custom to chance, but he who, with a light of his own, holding as little of chance as the prudence of the veriest plodder, appeals from custom to vision. Such a light had Samuel Budgett ; in this sense, and to this extent, he was an original man.

It is not easy to exhibit this originality of Budgett's in action. When once a thing is done, as Columbus, and that wonderful Chinese genius who discovered that pigs could be roasted without burning houses, knew, its performance, nay its invention, seem the simplest things in the world. If we trace Budgett's career step by step, we find nothing in the course of his ascent to wealth and influence which it does not seem certain that we should have done had we been in the circumstances. Yet it is almost certain we should have done otherwise ; and we have this simple way of satisfying ourselves as to the probability that we should, viz., by inquiring whether, mutatis mutandis, we are advancing in our own sphere. In every walk of life there are certain minutiae which are visible only to the man of insight, and to be seized only by the man of tact, but which are yet the tender, scarce perceptible, filaments leading to fortune's mines. If you know not how to see and seize these in your own department, depend upon it, gentle reader, had you been put down, instead of Samuel Budgett, in this shop at Kingswood, you would have sold groceries over the counter all the days of your life.

Mr Arthur sketches, with much animation and graphic power, the progress of Budgett, as he pushed on, step by step, and won position after position ; but we shall not here follow him. The reader must picture to himself a man of untiring activity who is yet never flurried, of keen and constant sagacity, of tact in dealing with men, of real and abounding affection to his fellows, so that the interest he manifests in their affairs has in it no element of deceit or affectation. He must mark him ever in the van of circumstance, discerning opportunity from afar, and seizing it with eagle swoop. He must see him gradually diffusing a spirit akin to his own on all who come within the sphere of his influence ; incapacity, indolence, and dishonesty, shrinking from his look. He must note specially the skill with which he combines conservation with advance. The customer who is secured is always first attended to ; all thought of extending the trade is to be postponed to his convenience ; the shops which deal with Budgett are seen to be the most prosperous, and no customer is ever lost. Looking at the perfect internal working of the business, one fails to find any suggestion of progress ; to mark how it is expanding, one is apt to think extension the sole endeavour. Budgett has always his foot on the firm ground ; but the light in his eye comes from yon bright gleam still in the distance.

The business has now branched out in all directions. There are "several establishments" in Bristol ; the retail shop is the centre of great warehouses and counting-houses ; at Kingswood there are kept forty-seven draught horses. One night the citizens of Bristol are startled by the reddening of the whole horizon in the direction of Kingswood Hill ; the warehouses of the Messrs Budgett are in flames. The men of Bristol stand gazing as the huge blaze illumines the sky ; from all neighbouring quarters there is a flocking of spectators, and a racing of engines. Efforts are vain ; the horses, indeed, the stables, and the books, are preserved ; but warehouses, counting-houses, and the retail shop, are burned to the ground. Samuel Budgett has not, of course, forgotten to insure, yet the pecuniary loss is above three thousand pounds. Here surely is enough to confuse one ; without warning, and in a night, the fury of fire consumes your accumulated substance, and puts its volcanic interruption on your arrangements ; your workmen are flung out of their posts, your methods of work are broken up, your whole business-machine is torn limb from limb, and lies scattered in fragments. Now is the hour to prove whether you are a man of self-command and originality ; whether your mind is of that iron order which the sound of battle clears and animates ; whether, when custom, on which, as on a quiet horse, you have hitherto ridden composedly along, suddenly pitches you from its neck and leaves you sprawling, you have courage and power to rise to your feet, and lay your hand on a new steed, and vault on his back, and break him in for yourself. Budgett sees into the whole matter, and comprehends how it is to be managed, precisely as if he had done nothing his life long but set things in train after sudden fires. The next morning every customer expecting goods on that day from the Budgetts receives a circular. It states briefly that there has been a fire on the premises, and that one day is necessary to repair the consequent disarrangement. Just one day: in such length of time, Samuel calculates, the wrath of the fire will have been baulked. And one day is sufficient. He goes swiftly, but with no hurry, into Bristol, hires a new house, sets all hands to work, and the next day sees all customers served. Bristol becomes henceforward the headquarters; and Samuel Budgett, now the sole head of the business, is more powerful than ever.

This is the true English working talent; the same quiet, speedy energy you see in Marlborough, in Monk, and, in grander combination, in Cromwell; in whatever form it is embodied, there is no standing it; men, nations, nature itself, give way before it.

It was but an unpromising sphere in which we saw him finally set to work; a village shop, with a line of donkeys at its door. There he took his post, to measure himself with his opponents,—to bring his force into the general system of social dynamics. Years have gone by, and the never-failing might of intellectual power has vindicated itself. The force of Budgett's mind has affected the whole region. His warehouses tower proudly, like those of merchant princes; over all the south-western counties of England his connection extends; over the sea, from distant lands, come vessels with cargoes for him. It is probable that a greater effect was not possible in his department. He was not in the arena of the Rothschilds and Barings ; he never measured himself against the rulers of the Stock Exchange. But in the field where he did contend, he distanced all competition ; without capital, without prestige, in a village in the vicinity of a large town, he built up a business which cast every rival into the shade. And those warehouses have been built, this magnificent business has been established, with no fortuitous aid from happy conjunctures of circumstance, or timeous openings of the field ; it has been by seeing the hitherto invisible, by descrying every trace of occasion, by the constant, imperceptible application of a clear and tireless intellect, that his triumphs have been won. And now he is a man of wealth and importance ; he has satisfied his youthful ambition. The day was when he sold cheese by the pound across the counter ; he now receives goods "by the cargo," and sells them "by the ton." The day was when it was a serious question whether goods might be conveyed to Doynton and Pucklechurch,—a momentous and amazing undertaking to journey once a-month to Frome ; he has now a regular staff of efficient travellers, spreading the connection north, south, east, into the very heart of England. "I remember," said an old man, who felt like a Caleb Balderstone on the subject—"I remember when there were five men and three horses ; and I have lived to see three hundred men and one hundred horses."

It may be here in place, although what is advanced must be taken with the commentary of all that is yet to be related of Budgett, to look fairly in the face certain objections which have been urged against him on the score of sharp trading. He rose, it has been whispered, by elbowing aside his fellows, by grasping, with unbecoming haste and eagerness, what, in natural order, would have fallen to other men ; if just, he was not generous ; he gave no indulgence, and made no allowance ; he pressed every advantage, and used every opportunity ; he seemed always at a running pace, while sober men walked. As the testimony of Mr Arthur, given in his vigorous and admirable work The Successful Merchant, may be considered somewhat partial to Budgett, and as it is well to have a view which you wish to combat stated in its most plausible form, I quote a paragraph from Mr Arthur's pages. He has just intimated that the subject of his narrative was "quick to descry an advantage, and resolute to press it ;" he proceeds thus :—"This . . . formed the chief deduction from the benevolence of his character. In business he was keen—deliberately, consistently, methodically keen. He would buy as scarcely any other man could buy ; he would sell as scarcely any other man could sell. He was an athlete on the arena of trade, and rejoiced to bear off the prize. He was a soldier on the battle-field of bargains, and conquered he would not be. His power over the minds of others was immense, his insight into their character piercing, his address in managing his own case masterly, and, above all, his purpose so inflexible, that no regard to delicacy or to appearances would for a moment beguile him from his object. He would accomplish a first-rate transaction, be the difficulty what it might. That secured, his word was as gold, and generosity was welcome to make any demands on his gains. But in the act of dealing, he would be the aptest tradesman in the trade. To those who only met him in the market, this feature of his character gave an unfavourable impression. They frequently felt themselves pressed and conquered, and naturally felt sore. To those who knew all the excellence and liberality which lay beneath this hard mercantile exterior, it appeared the peculiarity and the defect of an uncommonly worthy man, yet still a defect and a peculiarity."

What is the general law on this point ? how does nature arrange in the matter ?

In all professions and trades, certain contending forces are brought into play. No man denies that the faculties of respective men, their sagacity, their energy, their perseverance, are different. Every profession is a form of human exertion, an arena for human power ; and it is all but implied in this, that in every profession there will be degrees of success and failure. From this last circumstance it will be an inevitable result, that certain persons find themselves surpassed, beaten, thwarted, and that they feel pain in consequence. It is one of the sad consequences of the fall, irremediable save by a reversal of that fall, but, like other such painful phenomena, itself of remedial tendency in the body politic, that every man who rises in any profession must tread a path more or less bedewed by the tears of those he passes on his ascent. The incompetent or indolent soldier takes commands from his able and active comrade who has left the ranks ; the able and indefatigable physician absorbs the practice of the dullard or the empiric ; the lawyer whose logic is as a Damascus sabre, and who wields it with an Arab arm, condemns his heavy-eyed or careless brother to starve. There may be no envy and no hate ; there may be no feeling of indignation, and no affixing of blame ; but there will be at least the pain of privation, of failure. More peculiarly does this apply to mercantile professions. Here the precise mode in which talent is brought to bear is in making money : if you are so much abler than your neighbour, you win so much the more money than he ; and, as your relative winnings are drawn from a common store, namely, the purse of the public, the more you have the less he gets. Depend upon it, he will in these circumstances feel "sore."

What, it may be inquired further, are the components of that force which a man brings rightfully into the arena of his profession ? Its components are twofold—capital and faculty. It is a man's right and duty to use these to the utmost. In some professions, intellectual power constitutes the whole force ; but it is not so in commercial affairs. It is honourable, as will not be questioned, to lay out at fair interest the money or other capital which is yours. It is precisely as honourable to use to its last iota the faculty which nature has committed to your charge. If you see the gleam of a gold vein where I saw only clay, the reward is justly yours ; if you know the ground where corn will grow better than I, your sheaves must be more numerous than mine ; if you have stronger sinew and more perseverance, and choose to toil for hours in the westering sun after I have unyoked my team, you must lay a wider field under seed than I. And no upright or manly feeling in me will permit me to accuse you when you thus work your faculties to the utmost. The pearls are for him that can dive, the golden apples for him that can climb. I am no brave man if I bid you bate your energies out of pity or misnamed courtesy ; and if you listen to such request, you incur the responsibility of showing, at the last, a return on your talents not so great as He will know to have been possible who gave you them to occupy till His coming. Nature—and the word is used to designate reverently the method of His working who is nature's power—intends every faculty to be used to the utmost. A man who expects less from his competitors than an unsparing use of all their means, is a coward ; a man who aims at having more than the full use of his own, is a churl.

There are two positive and conclusive proofs that this is nature's intention, which will be presently adduced. But it may first be asked, whether this view of the case does not accord with the general feeling and sense of men. Is it not a bitter insult to a man who is on an equal footing with yourself, to temper your powers till they can act without in any way annoying him, to disguise your faculties that he may not feel his weakness ? Is it not recognised, that if one man sees where he can make a bargain honourably and openly while another man is blind, and, instead of availing himself of the opportunity, apprises his neighbour of its whereabouts, he virtually gives the latter a dole?

Leaving this, however, the two following considerations demonstrate the fact that nature means and commands men, without asking questions, and in every department of affairs, to use their talents to the utmost.

The first is, That this is nature's method of spurring on the indolent, and having her work rightly done. Every true man is a whip in nature's hand to scourge on the laggard: if he works rightly, he must be so. And if there is whipping, there must be feeling. What is it which keeps the human race in progress at all? What is it which prevents our sitting down by the wayside and falling into a half-sleep, and, finding what will merely suffice for an animal existence, moving onward no more? Is it not that, at intervals, in the several corps of the army, a strong and determined spirit starts up, who will strike forwards with new speed, and, despite the remonstrance of the slothful, animate the whole battalion to fresh life and energy? Nature makes you pay for every hour of sleep or pleasure beyond the number she approves; and he whom she appoints to receive for her the payment is the man who has worked while you have slept or trifled.

But, secondly, it is found that nature is here kind also; that, however individuals may smart and grumble, this method subserves most effectually the interests of the majority. Her aim is thoroughness of work and amount of produce; when these are attained the common weal is best consulted. And to reach this it is necessary that all the faculty of the community be at work, and to its utmost strain. One man cannot possibly restrain the honourable action of his powers for the sake of the feelings of another, without the loss of a certain amount of that force by which nature carries on her operations and provides for her children : kindness must blunt no sword or scythe, or it will cause ten to weep instead of one.

The idea of charity is alien to the idea of trade ; all that can be demanded under the name of mercantile honour is justice.

These remarks, and especially the second of the proofs that nature intends no respect to be shown to individual feeling in mercantile competition, will be illustrated by a glance at the general effect of the success of Samuel Budgett in the south-west of England. That effect was a general increase in the animation and vigour of his order of commercial operations over the district. The customers caught the spirit of those who had so ably secured their custom ; the firms still able to contend bestirred themselves ; there was new activity everywhere. In one word, nature's work was better done in those quarters than formerly. Mr Arthur appears to be unconscious of that very important aspect of the operations of the commercial class which is now referred to. He recognises the duty of each man to provide for himself ; he recognises the duty of every man to "adapt his services to the general good ;" but he does not perceive that, in the thorough performance of this last task, the man may find it impossible to avoid giving pain to certain of his own class. The confusion into which he falls arises from his failing adequately to distinguish the "general interest" of the public from the interest of competing merchants. He argues as if it ought to have been an element in Budgett's motives and calculations, to provide for the success of those engaged in operations similar to his own. He starts with a condemnation of Budgett for inflicting "soreness" on those with whom he dealt ; but he never says, and his whole book is an affirmation of the opposite, that Budgett did not work as effectually for the public good as was possible. It was his brother merchants alone who suffered ; it was in the market he was harsh ; it was the extreme thoroughness of his performance of that task which Mr Arthur accurately defines as the merchant's in the social system,—the task of “directly conveying the creatures of God into the hands” of those for whom they are intended,—which made him at times obnoxious to those who performed the same task, from whatever cause, not quite so thoroughly.

In point of fact, it is here that the radical strength and stamina of Budgett's character become conspicuous. The circumstances urged in objection are conclusive proof that his mind was hale and of strong fibre,—that vital Christianity had introduced no softness or incapacity for working to the utmost of his powers into his nature. Mr Arthur informs us, his aim was unimpeachable honour and his word gold. We know, too, that money was not his object; that wealth was a matter for which he cared little. The proof of this important point is perfect. He did not cling, with miserly tenacity, to business to the last; he took matters quietly, and strove after no further extension when life was still strong in him. After he had ceased to attend with his old impelling vigour to the affairs of the firm, he heard some one say that he, the speaker, wished for more money. “Do you?” exclaimed Budgett: “then I do not; I have quite enough. But if I did wish for more, I should get it.” On his death-bed, when his voice was tremulous with the last weakness, he deliberately said, “Riches I have had as much as my heart could desire, but I never felt any pleasure in them for their own sake, only so far as they enabled me to give pleasure to others;” and we know him to have been a man, out of the market, of a generosity which might be deemed extravagant. His brother merchants did unquestionably at times feel themselves disagreeably overborne, did experience an uneasy sensation, and call him keen and harsh. It is always unpleasant to pay tribute, and these men were commanded by nature to pay tribute to Budgett as their king. And why did he, who had no particular desire for money, and an acute feeling of any pain he gave, thus permit himself, no doubt consciously, to pain his brother merchants? It was the strong instinct of the born merchant; it was the strong instinct of the true man. He could not dishonour his competitors by supposing them incapable of the stern joy of warriors in worthy foemen; he could not rein his steeds that stumbling or laggard hacks might reach the goal before him: he could not, without intense suffering, curb the faculties nature had given him, or turn them from their work. Those who experienced his power felt sore: certainly. Did the sectioners feel sore when they arrived at the camp of Sablons "some minutes" too late, and found that Napoleon had clutched the guns? But was it not right that the quick mind and ready hand should have them? In the market, Budgett knew instinctively that integrity ruled, that charity and favour were alien to the place; had he won counters instead of guineas, he would have acted just in the same way. One can imagine him even having had compunctious touches; but a sterner and healthier feeling would overrule pity, and hold it firmly in its place.

" I'd give the lands of Deloraine Brave Musgrave were alive again ;"

so said the chivalrous William, although he had just explained that, were Musgrave alive again, it would be necessary for him, by the rules of Border honour, at once to re-kill him.

This whole argument in defence of Budgett falls to the ground if it can be proved that, in his habitual dealing, there was the slightest infraction of equity, the slightest departure from the rules of the game. But, since we perceive that all the pain occasioned to his rivals in the market can be accounted for simply, rationally, and probably in another way, —since we are absolutely certain that he had no particular love of money, —and since we find his hand to the full as ready to give as to gain,—may we not confidently declare his sharp, or rather his thorough dealing in business, to have been no deduction from his benevolence, but to have been a testimony of remarkable point and conclusiveness to the general force and ability of his character ? To any man that needed a helping hand he would have extended one ; but if you met him on the field, you were foot to foot and eye to eye opposed, and mercy could come only in the form of contempt. Saladin sent Cœur-de-Lion a horse that he might fight like a knight ; but did he blunt his sabre when he met him on the battle-plain ?*

We have now seen, so to speak, the framework of our man ; we find that it is the unflawed iron of integrity, clear insight, and energy : he is a man who can work.

But we saw that, in his boyhood, there was not only a stern, but a gentle aspect of his character : we may find now that this iron framework of his manhood is wreathed with verdure and dewy flowers. We have seen him when he had simply to measure his strength : we must survey him now as a master ; as a member of society philanthropically desirous of removing its evils ; and as a father.

Entering Budgett's central establishment, where, as we

* All this, so far as the general principle is concerned, still appears to me unassailable and important. But in its application to Budgett I confess that I now entertain some doubts whether it goes the whole length necessary to his vindication. Hundreds of men have made fortunes as large as his, and from similar beginnings. In their case, as well as in Budgett's, the general causes of dislike here detailed would act ; but they have retained, even in the circles of their own profession, even as men of business, a character for open-handed frankness and genial acquiescence in the success of others. This character Budgett did not bear. I cannot perceive how he could have missed it, except through the action of some element in his trading habits which pertained to him alone, and which had been better away. To show in words what this was may be impossible. I cannot think that Mr Arthur has correctly pointed it out. It was something to be felt rather than seen ; and the opinion, universal so far as I have been able to judge, among men of business, that it did exist, must, I fear, be accepted as conclusive in the case.

have seen, hundreds of men are employed, we find that the whole works with faultless regularity. The genius of English industry seems to have chosen the place as a temple. There is no fuss, little noise : there is no haste—no time for that. The face of every workman shows that he may not linger ; its firm lines at the same time declare that he has no wish to do so. Hearty activity, healthful, contented diligence, are seen on every hand. The immense daily business is timeously transacted ; and the hours of evening see the place shut and silent.

Samuel Budgett is the mainspring of the whole vast machine. Under the middle size, with strong brows, open forehead, and lower features firm and clearly cut, he may at once be discerned to be a man who can dare and do : his “quick brown eye” pierces everywhere, and overlooks nothing ; its glance making the wheels go faster. He speaks a word of encouragement to the active, he sends an electric look to the indolent ; it is plain his authority is unquestionable, and that he retains and uses it without an effort. Bungling of no sort, be it from want of power or want of will, can live in his glance ; he can detect falsehood lurking in the depths of an eye, and veiling itself in the blindest smile ; he has a tact and ready invention which find a quiet road to every secret ; only perfect thoroughness of work and perfect honesty of heart can stand before him. Yet the kindly and approving is evidently his most natural and congenial look ; he speaks many a word of sympathy and kindness ; the respect and deference which wait on his steps are tempered by affection.

As a master he is, first of all, thorough. His men have a profound knowledge that he is not to be trifled with. The incompetent, the indolent, are discharged. A man must perform what he has taken in hand. or go. “Why, sir,” said one who had been long in his service, “I do believe as he would get, aye, just twice as much work out o’ a man in a week as another master." This power of infusing a working spirit into men explains his entire success. Conceive every man he employed working thoroughly : everything else becomes then conceivable. He has the gift of knowing men ; for him who would prosper in any sort of practical endeavour, it is the indispensable gift. To this thoroughness and penetration it was of course again incident that pain was felt in certain quarters ; rotten branches, ineffective workmen, could not be cut away without crashing and crackling : here, too, we meet the fine confirmatory evidence of his real power and energy, that he awakened complaints on the part of those in whom these were lacking.

Next, he has a warm and honest sympathy with his men. It is not the result of their work, in the shape of his own profit, which gratifies him, so much as the satisfaction and advantage of all who work along with him. We find no niggardliness, no appearance of strain, in his efforts to attain wealth. If he gets more work out of men than other masters, his employed get more from him in the best forms than other men. At the time of his entering partnership, the working hours are from six in the morning to nine at night. This goes against the new partner's grain. "I do not like to see you here," he would say to the employed ; "I want to see you at home : we must get done sooner." Dismissal at half-past eight is attempted, and the men are greatly relieved. But this is only a commencement. If there are too few men, more can be added ; if there is trifling, men must go altogether. As the business enlarges, the time shortens ; and Samuel does not rest until he sees his men all trooping off cheerily to their families at five or half-past five in the evening. Keep these parallel achievements in view when you estimate the generosity and mercantile honour of Budgett. There is in the establishment a regular system of fines ; but the head or heads pay most, and the whole goes to a sick fund. There is an annual festival given to the men ; good cheer, athletic games, and a certain amount, moderate, it may be hoped, of speech-making, speed the hours. The Rev. Mr Carvasso, hearing our merchant speak on one such occasion, thinks his address of "an extraordinary character," wishes it had been printed, and adds, "Except on that occasion, I never heard him come out in a set public address, but the talent then displayed convinced me of the grasp of his mind, and how greatly some had mistaken him." There is a systematic distribution of small rewards from week to week ; Budgett stands at a certain outlet to the premises with a pocketful of little packages containing money, and slips one into each man's hand as he passes out ; "one would find he had a present of five shillings, another of three, another of half a crown ;" the gift is graduated by relative merit. "Ah, Sir," exclaims an old informant, "he was a man as had no pleasure in muckin' up money ; why, Sir, he would often in that way give, aye, I believe, twenty pounds on a Friday night,—well, at any rate, fifteen pounds." Besides this, certain of the employed are made directly to feel their interest in the success of the business. "When a year wound up well, the pleasure was not all with the principals ; several of those whose diligence and talent had a share in gaining the result, found that they had also a share in the reward." "One," Mr Arthur goes on to say, "after describing the pains Mr Budgett had taken to make him master of his own branch of the business, and how, when satisfied with his fitness, he had devolved upon him important responsibilities, said, with a fine feeling which I should love to see masters generally kindle among those in their employment, 'And he never had a good year, but I was the better for it when stock-taking came.'"

But, last and most important of all, Budgett, in his capacity as master, is a religious man,—a real, earnest Christian. We have not now to ask whether his energy is unimpeded and unrelaxed, whether his powers have their full swing ; but it is important to learn of what sort his religion is, and to what extent it pervades his life, that we may know whether it is of a nature to be pronounced effete,—whether it is, on the one hand, a fashionable deistic assent to Christianity, or, on the other, a cramped fanaticism or bigotry, not blending in kindly union with the general modes of his existence. In his case Christianity was never intellectually doubted ; and he may therefore be taken as a good example of a thorough English merchant, who still, in the nineteenth century, drew the vital strength of his character from that Christian religion in which he had been born, and in which he had unconsciously grown up. His religion was of that personal, penetrating order, which has in all times characterized men who, even among Christians, have been recognised as such in a peculiar sense ; of that sort which made Bunyan weep in anguish, and at which the merely respectable person in all ages laughs ; of that sort against which Sydney Smith aimed his fine but melancholy raillery, in unaffected wonderment at its refusing to him the name of Christian minister. This determined merchant, whom we have seen pushing on to fortune through the press of vainly opposing rivals, humbles himself daily before God, searches his soul for secret sins, finds cause for keenest sorrow in the turning of God's countenance away from him. This Budgett can weep like a child, or like Bunyan, or an old Ironside, for his shortcomings. Christianity is to him as fresh as it was to Peter when Christ commanded him to feed His lambs ; its salvation is to him as clear a reality as it was to Stephen when he saw heaven opened. And it blends in the kindest union with his whole character and actions ; he feels that a Christian must be one all in all ; he lives as if in the continual sense of having been made by Christ one of God's priests upon earth. His natural tact, and power of winding himself into close conversation, so as to get at men's inmost hearts, are brought into the service of the gospel. In an unostentatious, quiet way, he manages to urge its claims on his men, by casual words, in little snatches of conversation, at any moment when he has them alone. Every man in his establishment is perpetually reminded that he is considered by his master an immortal being, and feels that all temporary differences between them are merged in the sublime unities in which Christianity embraces all human relations. Once a man came begging employment of him : the wife of the applicant thus narrated the result :—“I shall never forget my husband's feelings when he came in after having seen Mr Budgett for the first time. He wept like a child ; indeed, we both wept, for it was so long since anybody had been kind to us. Mr Budgett had been speaking to him like a father ; but what affected him most was this,—when he had signed the agreement, Mr Budgett took him from the counting-house into a small parlour in his own house, and offered up a prayer for him and his family.” The young men resident on the premises have separate rooms, for the express end that they may be able to seek God in private. There is daily prayer on the premises ; every day, in the morning, the whole concern is, as it were, brought directly under the eye of God, His authority over it recognised, and His blessing invoked. And every year at stock-taking, ere Samuel became sole head, it was observed that the two brothers, when it was ascertained what precise progress had been made, retired into a private room, and there joined together in prayer. It is a Christian mercantile establishment.

And what is the result on the whole ? There is the progress we have seen,—a progress which we can now to some extent understand. His neighbour tradesmen are heard to “speak as if he rose by magic,” and to insinuate that “there is some deep mystery in his affairs :” we have some idea of his enchantments. But the progress is not all. There is another circumstance, of which certain hints have already been let fall, but which is deserving of special attention. It is the fact that there is diffused through the whole body of the employed a loyal zeal for the success of the business,—that they are united by sympathy in a common aim,—that they feel as true mariners for the honour of their ship, as true soldiers for the fame of their regiment. His men, we hear, are “personally attached” to Budgett; they like to work with him and for him; they are proud of what has been done, and proud of having contributed to its achievement. This is a notable fact. With it, as the crown of the whole, we complete our survey of Budgett in the capacity of master.

The prospect which has been opened up to us suggests certain lessons, clearly legible, and of vital concernment, touching what may be called the practical philosophy of social life in this our age.

It being sufficiently evident that feudal tenures and powers have in our day ceased to exist, and the first general glance at our social arrangements seeming to reveal “cash-payment” to be “the sole nexus,” the universal connecting medium, between the classes of society which employ and those which are employed, Mr Carlyle and others have pronounced on the case in contempt, wrath, and lamentation. In a pamphlet recently published by Mr Carlyle, its objectionable aspect is finely represented by a high personage who complains to the writer. If conscience and common sense permit, it is well to condole with our distressed fellow-creatures. Let us therefore accord a hearing to his complaints. “Drops of compassion tremble on our eyelids,” &c. :—

“The Duke of Trumps,” says Mr Carlyle, “who sometimes does me the honour of a little conversation, owned that the state of his domestic service was by no means satisfactory to the human mind. ‘Five-and-forty of them,’ said his Grace, ‘really, I suppose, the cleverest in the market, for there is no limit to the wages : I often think how many quiet families, all down to the basis of society, I have disturbed, in attracting gradually, by higher and higher offers, that set of fellows to me ; and what the use of them is when here ! I feed them like aldermen, pay them as if they were sages and heroes. Samuel Johnson’s wages, at the very last and best, as I have heard you say, were L.300 or L.500 a-year ; and Jellysnob, my butler, who indeed is clever, gets, I believe, more than the highest of these sums. And,—shall I own it to you?—in my young days, with one valet, I had more trouble saved me, more help afforded me to live, actually more of my will accomplished, than from these forty-five I now get, or ever shall. It is all a serious comedy,—what you call a melancholy sham. Most civil, obsequious, and indeed expert fellows these ; but bid one of them step out of his regulated sphere on your behalf ! An iron law presses on us all here,—on them and on me. In my own house, how much of my will can I have done,—dare I propose to have done ? Prudence, on my part, is prescribed by a jealous and ridiculous point-of-honour attitude on theirs. They lie here more like a troop of foreign soldiers that had invaded me, than a body of servants I had hired. At free quarters ; we have strict laws of war established between us ; they make their salutes, and do certain bits of specified work, with many becks and scrapings ; but as to service, properly so called, ——— ! I lead the life of a servant, Sir ; it is I that am a slave ; and often I think of packing the whole brotherhood of them out of doors one good day, and retiring to furnished lodgings ; but have never done it yet !’ Such was the confession of his Grace.”

Readers may be disposed to join in returning to the Duke

some such reply as this :—"Your complaint, we must confess, is indeed pitiful. Your domestics look upon you manifestly as a mere dispenser of good things ; they know you have money, and that by a little juggling they can get it out of your hands ; they laugh at you in their sleeves ; you are among them as the returning lord in Don Juan among the groupes that feasted at his expense ; in one word, they make a fool of you. Now this is never done, your Grace, unless nature gives material assistance. You perceive that the sailors in a seventy-four do not make a fool of their captain ; Budgett's men, we find, made no fool of him ; and do you think that the man to whom you confess would be made a fool of in that style, were he in your place ? He has made something very like an assertion that you are a 'reed shaken in the wind ;' he thinks, we used to understand, that your Grace's coat and badges were 'torn in a scuffle' somewhere about 1789 ; your resort for consolation was a little strange. What does your Grace want ? Would you have your fellow-creatures bow down to your coronet ? They say it is of faded tinsel. Would you have them reverence the face of which you are the 'tenth transmitter ? They say, 'O, look at it ; it is uncommonly foolish.' Would you like to have the gallows-tree on your lawn, and manacles in a dungeon under your hall ? Like enough ; but these are precisely what your Grace never shall get ; reach forth your hand to them, and see whether a red stream will not flow to wash your parchments very white ! Your Grace finds it too much to remember the duties for which you have hired your servants ; you have no tact or authority to rule men, no dignified self-respecting sympathy to win them. You fancy it is the form of your connection that prevents your being honoured ; it is no such thing : the dying Napoleon awed men by the power of his eye, when his tongue was already silent ; but men of your stamp were never truly obeyed since the world began. Not even a gallows would help you ; it is a hopeless case. And we regard it as exactly as it should be ; like master, like man. Your affliction administers to us soft delectation ; we should deem it treacherous to our time to pity you. We give you sixpence !"

The case is simple enough ; the phenomenon need not startle us. The old obedience has indeed passed away ; and true it is that obedience has never been, and can never be, bought by money. What then ? There is a new obedience possible. Thanks to the French Revolution, thanks, whatever its evils, to advancing democracy, that it has struck, as by a universal electric shock, into the heart of humanity the idea, to be extinguished never again, but to work itself more and more into life and development, that no parchment written by human hand, no gold dug from earthly mine, can give a man title to obedience. That title must be written with other than human ink, bought with other than earthly gold. It must be written on the brow in lines of strength and thoughtfulness ; it must be seen on the lip, where earnest self-respect, and habitual self-command, and resolution that can die, have displaced vanity, sensuality, and pride ; it must glow, with a clear and ethereal fulness as of heaven's sanctioning light, from the unagitated eye, in the calmness of comprehending knowledge, the deliberate energy of justice, the disarming magic of love, the constraining majesty of godliness. As never before, all men are now flung on their individuality ; obedience is seen to be a thing beyond the reach of purchase, the possibility of transmission ; if you can rule men, they will obey you ; if you cannot, there is no help. Look into that establishment of Budgett's once more. What tie subsists between him and his men ? The only visible tie is of gold ; he pays them certain moneys, and they work for him in return ; their right to stay, his right to retain them, are precisely equal. Is he not, then, their master ? He can show no patent of nobility unless he has one from "Almighty God;" he was rocked in no ducal cradle, he wears no feudal coronet, beneath his mansion is no dungeon. Yet is he not a master? Shall we say that the obedience which waits upon his steps is of degraded quality, or unworthy of the name, because it is expressed in the alacrity of the open and manly forehead, the willing sympathy, unshaded by fear and untainted by sycophancy, of the freeman's kindling eye? Shall we say that the workman no longer renders to his natural and equal master a service and homage, as precious and as sincere as those of the serf who was predestined, ere his birth, to follow his chief whithersoever his bare will ordained, because the honeysuckles of his cottage wrap his own inviolable castle, and free-born children gambol round his knee? That he toils is no disgrace; it is appointed him by no injustice of man, but by the beneficent, though stern, decree of nature; and his evening may be as glad and tranquil when the day's work is over, his sleep as sweet ere he goes forth to labour, his self-respect, his independence, his bold uncowering truthfulness, in one word, his whole inheritance both of duty and reward, as rich in the essential bounties of freedom as those of his master. Some men must ever ride in the car of civilization, while others drag it. The old reins by which men were guided have been wrenched from the hands of the drivers; the drivers themselves have, in some places, been rolled in the dust, and trampled in their gore. But the fate of the French nobility need not be universal; a strong and wise man can yet take the seat, and with new reins—the golden chords of love, the viewless chains of sympathy—still guide and control men. We see Budgett, a man born in poverty, do so with easy and natural effort. Why look back? Why not rather charge ourselves than our time? Why perpetually gaze with reverted visage on the confined Past? That lingering red is not the flush of health; that tranquil and smiling slumber is not the repose of gathering energy ; it is the stillness and rigid moulding of death that are on that face ; no resurrection ever woke a buried era. Feudalism in all its aspects—its airy and gallant chivalries, its simple devotions, its conventual dreamings—with its Du Guesclins, its good Douglasses, its kingly Abbot Samsons, its troop of fair ladies riding with golden stirrups to the crusade—has passed away to the very spirit and essence, and Democracy lays its iron roads across its grave. Many generations will gaze on the picture of the whole resuscitated life of the thirteenth century, as it has been painted, in a boldness of outline and incomparable richness of colour which must long defy the rounding finger and obscuring breath of time, by Mr Carlyle ; yet Abbot Samson had his hand-gyves in his dungeon, and no tongue dared to move in his presence. The man who will rule men in an era of freedom must dispense with these ; and though the hero of Past and Present was assuredly born a prince and ruler, men of his radical type are still extant, and even common, in England ; and why obstinately close our eyes to the same power as his, when exhibited, not in a mediæval monastery, but in a mercantile establishment of the working era ? Of old you might have obedience of serfs, but you had not freedom. In the modern time, when your masters are incompetent, you have a pretended though ignoble freedom on the part of servants, and no true obedience. Where you have competent masters and governed servants, both are free. Is it reasonable, then, and manly, to whine and whimper over our modern arrangements, as might a delicate-looking Puseyite curate, or to sneer at, and denounce, and turn away from them, as do very different men, instead of recognising it as one great task and duty of our age to reconcile master-ship with freedom, and valiantly setting about it ? That Mr Carlyle has written on these matters as he has done may well excite surprise. I may have utterly misconceived the whole purport and philosophy of his History of the French Revolution ; but, if I have any decided idea as to the meaning of that book, or of what he says in his essay on Ebenezer Elliott, it is, that one great lesson he would enforce is, that the feudal nobility must either vanish, or show themselves possessed of personal powers to win the respect and affectionate obedience of men. Yet this duke is precisely one of those persons who could have no power except what lay in chains and badges. The world has seen strange things ; but it may be worth its while to turn aside and contemplate Mr Carlyle in the capacity of apologist for pithless personages still fondly called noblemen.

The true point of view from which to discern the essential type and distinguishing characteristics of Budgett is the mercantile : it is him in his true character you see, when you mark his intense delight as he moves among a group of active working men, animating them by his presence, directing their movements, and thrilling with sympathy for honest exertion. But we must briefly glance at the other phases which his character displays : we must see him fairly out of the commercial atmosphere. And what aspect does he present to us ? He comes out from the mine where he has been toiling so eagerly with the gold he has so manfully won. Has he the greedy, inhuman look of the miser, the small frost-bitten eye of the niggard ? He has worked hard, and the result we see in money : the “beaverish” talent he certainly possesses. Has his soul become beaverish too ? No. He has still the boy’s heart which throbbed with joy when he flung his boyish earnings, the thirty pounds,—which probably appeared to him then a greater sum than any he afterwards possessed,—into his mother’s lap. Over the deep mine, far up in the taintless azure, he has ever caught the gleam of treasure which might well purge his eyes in the glare of earthly gold. To make money has been his duty ; he could not work to the measure of his abilities without that result ; but to give is his delight and his reward. With the same tact which stood him in such good stead among his workmen and customers, he strikes out devices of good ; with his native energy he carries them out. His positive expenditure in philanthropic objects is fully L.2000 a-year. His mansion becomes a centre of beneficent light for the whole district,—in every direction the broken mists of ignorance and vice retiring. His heart is as warm, his hand as open, as if he had never known what it was to make a shilling ; he shows himself worthy to be a steward of nature, with large gifts committed for disposal to his hand ; he scatters bounty where his agency is unseen ; he ever makes charity the handmaid of industry, never of recklessness or sloth ; the blessed influence of generosity, tempered by justice, and governed by strong intelligence, is felt over the district.

And now we shall look for a few moments into the sanctuary of his home. We saw him take his early love to be his wife, in a little cottage in an English lane. As his other projects have prospered in his hands, his cottage has gradually changed its appearance ; he is now in a commodious mansion, seated in the midst of broad pleasure-grounds, and commanding a wide prospect of that region which his presence has lighted with new comfort and gladness. In his family circle we find him displaying the same traces of original character which we have marked in his procedure elsewhere. His children are admitted to an unwonted intimacy and confidence. “ They knew his business affairs intimately, and in every perplexing case he would gather them round him, with their mother and aunt, and take their advice. His standing council was formed of the whole family, even at an age when other fathers would think it cruel and absurd to perplex a child with weighty concerns.” He seems to have attained that perfection of domestic rule where kindness is so governed by sagacity that severity is banished, yet every good effect of severity won. The sympathy which he meets among his workmen, and which lends an aspect of noble work and noble governance to his whole business establishment, pervades, with a still finer and more tender warmth, the chambers of his home ; his children go hand-in-hand with him in his plans of improvement, the willing instruments in every philanthropic device. And he feels that he has their sympathy in higher things than these ; we hear him expressing the conviction that they are all going along with him on the way to heaven. This is the final touch of joy that can gild a Christian home, a ray of heaven's own glory coming to blend with, to hallow, to crown, the blessings of earth. Be it a delusion or not, one would surely wish to "keep so sweet a thing alive : " if it is a fond enthusiastic dream, so perfect is the smile of happiness on the dreaming face, that it were surely kind to let the sleeper slumber on. He believes that all his family will again gather round him on the plains of heaven : that the flowers which now shed fragrance through his life will continue to bloom beside immortal amaranths ; that the voices which are now the music of his being will mingle with the melodies of his eternal home ; that the light of those smiles which greet his approach to his threshold, and which now make summer in his heart, will blend with the light that fadeth never. Let us not say that his hopes are vain : his children are his friends, and friendship lives in the spirit-land.

Thus soft, genial, tenderly kind, do we find the hard-trading Budgett, when we contemplate him where kindness and tenderness are in place. Depend upon it, were he not a right merchant in the market, he would not be so gentle in the home : it is only the strong who can thus wrap the paternal rod in flowers. To see him in the market, one would say there was not a dew-drop of poetry to soften the ruggedness of his nature. Follow him in a walk on his own grounds, and you are apt to think him a soft sort of man, with somewhat of a sentimental turn. For he has still the same open sense for nature's beauty and music that he had when he heard that little bird's morning carol, and felt in his young heart that God had answered his prayer for his mother. There is a certain dewiness, a flowery freshness, over his character, an air of unexhausted, unstrained strength. Three things, at least, nature has united in him, which have been deemed incompatible : thorough working faculty, religion of the sort which weeps for sins invisible to the world, and poetical sympathy. You may see him distancing his competitors in the market, until they whisper that he must work by magic ; you may see his cheek wet with tears as he prays to his God ; you may hear him, in gleeful tone, quoting verse after verse of poetry in his fields, while his children romp around. From his early days, too, the strange merchant has preached, and with extraordinary power ; his connection with the Wesleyan body leading him to this. His whole character, last of all, is veiled in humility ; his bearing is that of a truly modest, self-knowing man, who can act with perfect self-reliance, yet take advice, if such may come, from a child.

At the age of fifty-four, when it might have been hoped that many years of life were yet before him, Budgett gave symptoms of a fatal malady. Dropsy and heart-complaint showed themselves, and his strength gradually wore away. His death-bed was glorious even among Christian death-beds. And though no weighty argument can be based upon the closing scenes of Christian men, death-bed experience is not of slight importance. Life is assuredly more important than death ; on it ought the main attention to be fixed. Yet it is mere vacant absurdity to deny that fear casts its shade over mankind here below, as they look forward beyond time ; that it is really the king of terrors whose realm is the grave, and that it has been one grand aim of all religions to discrown the spectre. If, moreover, man is only for a span a denizen of time,—if he is yet to be born into eternity, and his life here is of importance only in its relation to his life beyond,—that must ever be a moment of supreme interest to men, when the immortal soul is preening her wings for an infinite ascent, when earth is becoming still, and voices out of the distance seem to reach the dying ear, and a strange radiance falls across the bourne into the glazing eye. Budgett found his simple Christian faith, laying hold of the sword of the Spirit, strong enough to palsy the arm of the terror-crowned, and strike from it its appalling dart; nay, he found that simple Christian faith of power sufficient to steady his eye in gaze upon the spectre, until his terrors faded away, and he became an angel standing at the gates of light. At first he was troubled and cast down; but ere long the victory was complete. I shall quote a few of his words, leaving readers to make upon them their own comments; to judge for themselves whether they express a selfish joy, or that of one whose delight was in holiness and in God; and to observe the child-like humility that breathes beneath their rapture. His death occurred in the April of 1851, and these words were uttered by him from the time that his illness began to manifest its fatal power; they sufficiently indicate the occasions of their utterance:—

“I sent for you to tell you how happy I am; not a wave, not a ripple, not a fear, not a shadow of doubt. I didn’t think it was possible for man to enjoy so much of God upon earth. I’m filled with God.”

“I like to hear of the beauties of heaven, but I do not dwell upon them; no, what I rejoice in is, that Christ will be there. Where He is, there shall I be also. I know that He is in me, and I in Him. I shall see Him as He is. I delight in knowing that.”

“How our Heavenly Father paves our way down to the tomb ! I seem so happy and comfortable ; it seems as if it cannot be for me, as if it must be for somebody else. I don’t deserve it.”

“I have sunk into the arms of Omnipotent Love.”

“I never asked for joy ; I always thought myself unworthy of it ; but He has given me more than I asked.”

“I am going the way of all flesh ; but, bless God, I’m ready. I trust in the merits of my Redeemer. I care not when, or where, or how ; glory be to God !”

A FEW WORDS ON MODERN DOUBT.

“THOSE,” says Mackintosh, “who are early accustomed to dispute first principles, are never likely to acquire in a sufficient degree that earnestness and that sincerity, that strong love of truth and that conscientious solicitude for the formation of just opinions, which are not the least virtues of men, but of which the cultivation is the more especial duty of all who call themselves philosophers.” This is a weighty remark ; not perhaps singularly recondite, but, beacon-like, giving warning of much, and peculiarly applicable to the present time. Behind us we see a long roll of ages ; as we look backwards over the path of mankind, we discern opinions of all sorts maintained by men of all orders of talent ; from belief in transubstantiation to belief in nothing,—all beliefs have had their able advocates. This prospect cannot again be darkened, this fact can no longer be disguised : while newspapers, and mechanic institutes, and ragged schools exist, men will know that the mode of their parish, of their country, of their generation, is not the only conceivable mode. Even the body of the people cannot again, save by an iron despotism, be brought to any such state as subsisted in ages long gone by. It is therefore nothing wonderful that a common phenomenon of the day is doubt.

In considering the aspects of the time, one cannot fail to be struck with the singular spectacles which arise out of this characteristic. One is forcibly reminded, in reflecting on some of these, of a certain Arabian tale. It records the fate of a vessel whose pilot unfortunately steered her into the too close vicinity of a magnetic mountain. The nails were attracted, the planks fell asunder, and total wreck ensued. It is no uncommon thing at present to see a man sailing in the vessel of his belief, and appearing to do well enough. But he hears some new system of philosophic or theological thought, or comes within the influence of some man of overwhelming powers. This is the magnetic mountain. It at once draws out the connecting and riveting points of his faith, and his whole ship, himself sprawling among the severed timbers, lies scattered wide on the tossing sea. But he manages to gather together the floating wreck, he repairs his belief, and again sets sail. Lo ! another magnetic mountain ; the nails are again flying ; again he lies discomfited among waves and mere confused planks. His courage does not quite fail, however ; yet again he gets piece to piece, and, under a new phase, once more sets forth : and so it proceeds, mountain after mountain, and phase after phase, the business of progress being wholly overlooked, and the time spent either in refitting or in proclaiming that now at last a balmy and salubrious region has been entered, that all ships ought to sail on this tack, and that the last magnetic mountain (the head of the next just becoming visible on the horizon) is positively the last in this world.

Now, it cannot be denied that there is an unwonted amount of intellectual foppishness at present extant. The old Byronic fop, who sneered with the precise sneer supposed to curl the lip of the Childe, and looked as if his friends ought to keep the knives well out of his way, has given place to the Carlylian dapperling. This one "looks under the shows of things," finds the age hopelessly decadent, deals out critical damnation on every writer of the day save Carlyle and Thackeray, and wishes his "great soul" had taken form in some heroic age, when men really believed, and had sense enough left to worship heroes like him.

True, however, as this is, it were a fatal error to confound with mere foppery the honest and earnest doubt which is met with. Our time demands a faithful valour beyond that of chivalry.

"There lives more faith in honest doubt, Believe me, than in half the creeds."

There may, in our quiet domestic life, arise temptations to mental cowardice as severe as ever prompted a soldier to quit the field under a cloud of dust, or on some plausible pretext: there may be suspicion and contempt to be encountered as biting as the cold steel, before which the clear eye scorned to flinch: there may be endearments as tender to be torn asunder in the struggle towards internal freedom and truth, as ever drew a manly tear from the strong knight who bade adieu to his ladye-love on his way to Palestine. There may be a deliberate abandonment, for the sake of a pure conscience, and to preserve an unpolluted mental atmosphere, of respect long accorded, of esteem won by kindness and faithfulness of heart, or deference, perhaps still dearer, to acknowledged power of intellect, of sympathetic joys from truth shared and loved in common, of hopes and expectations whose extinguishing is like quenching the last fire in a wintry day. This deliberate laying of the joys of earth on the altar of truth and conscience may cause severer pangs than were ever felt by the true warrior, who would march on though his companions fell stiff by the wayside, or continue to face the foe when he stood on ground slippery with the blood that was dear to him. The loneliness one feels when afar from the habitations of men, on the ocean or in the desert, is but a faint emblem of that dread feeling of sad and ghastly solitude which many a noble soul has experienced when compelled, by hests inaudible to his fellow-men, to pass forth alone into new regions of thought and belief. The former solitude was relative, and scarcely real : the hearts that loved him might be distant, but invisible threads of gold linked them still to his ; the smiles of welcome were waiting at the door of home, the accents of kindness, tremulous through excess of joy, would ring clear whenever his foot was heard on the threshold ; nay, by a thousand arts of nature's gentle magic, memory and imagination could make those smiles and accents present, to soothe his toil with encouragement, to fill with music the hot air round him : but here those golden chains themselves had been strained or riven, those smiles themselves had faded ; instead of a few miles of earth, there had yawned between him and the best riches of his heart an impassable chasm, and for consolation he could have no thought of an earthly home, but must listen only to the voice within, or look up to a Father who was in heaven.

“ Feebly must they have felt
Who, in old time, attired with snakes and whips
The vengeful Furies. Beautiful regards
Were turn'd on me,—the face of her I loved,
The Wife and Mother pitifully fixing Tender reproaches, insupportable !”

Such thoughts should make men at once careful and lenient in judging of those who differ from them and the majority, and especially should avert all asperity from the mode of dealing with young men who have been led to doubt, it may be through earnestness, and who have struggled to regain their footing, it may be almost in despair. Nevertheless it must be fully and boldly admitted what doubt really is and occasions in its bearing upon life and action. Blanco Whites and John Sterlings may be admirable, and may deserve commendation in many ways, or they may not ; but, if such are to be taken as specimens of widely extended classes, if men are more and more to resemble these, it is at least plain that work is no longer to be got done in this world. If our modern enlightenment is merely to produce a vast swarm of doubters, if every year and decade, with its harvest of systems and proposals, furnishes simply an addition of labour to the poor man of next generation, who would attain stable belief, the outlook of the future is startling ; it is perfectly manifest that the children of the Hebrews, the Romans, and the Puritans, must become moonstruck gazers rather than faithful workers, that the words of the poet must reach a positive and ghastly fulfilment, and Earth become the Bedlam of the universe. Only it is to be remembered that even this consideration must not be used as an argument that doubt should be stifled, and falsehood or partial falsehood, either real or suspected, contentedly accepted in its stead. Sad as the above spectacle may be, we must courageously behold it ; the searching, struggling, groping attitude is not defeat, but the best proof of worthiness of victory ; the eye in which is doubt will swim irresolute, the arm of the doubter will hang powerless ; but it is only the calmness of truth that must steady the one, and the energy of truth that must nerve the other ; falsehood is perfect blindness and perfect death.

If a suggestion might be hazarded as to a speedy method of reaching a firm and stable position, and putting an end, either in one way or another, to this paralyzing and afflicting doubt, it would be to this effect : That attention should be turned specially in two directions ; to determine the great fundamental points of belief, and to distinguish between what are mere difficulties and what are positive proofs or disproofs. It has often been remarked how near to each other in their original fountains are the streams of belief ; like rivers whose sources are seen by one poised condor on the topmost ridge of the Andes, and whose mouths are divided by a continent. Thus, philosophic faith and philosophic scepticism, wide apart as flow their respective streams, yet enter their several channels according to the answer, affirmative or negative, given to the simple question, Can the human consciousness be trusted? And there are not a few such determining questions whose answer may at the outset confirm Christian belief or summarily dismiss it. Of this sort are the following:—Whether, on the whole, the phenomenon presented by Paul can be accounted for, save on the hypothesis of the supernatural origin of Christianity? Whether, fairly applied to, history can take us to Judea and set us among the auditors of Christ, and whether, then and there, He can be deliberately pronounced a deceiver or deceived? Whether all the religions of men have been mere pitiable delusions, or are to be accounted for as pointing towards one true religion and doing it honour, as bending, unconsciously indeed, and as if with the vague motions of a dream, yet manifestly bending, around its greater light? Whether human history can furnish a precise or approximate analogue to the combination of New Testament morality and New Testament assertion of the exercise of supernatural power, on the hypothesis that the one is a hypocritic disguise and the other a pestilent lie, or that the one is the maundering of weakness and the other the dream of fanaticism? Such questions could be indefinitely multiplied, and many might be found far better adapted to the end than these. Such have the advantage of bringing the matter to a speedy issue. Be their answer positive or negative, the power of doubt to fetter action is broken; all succeeding questions are of secondary moment. And it will commend itself, as a reasonable and manly mode of procedure, that when once such definite answer has been given, minor questions be placed in the rank of mere difficulties, able no longer to menace the citadel of the soul. If I can believe that the Saviour wilfully deceived his disciples, the serenity of my unbelief will be troubled by no difficulty, serious as in itself it might be, in accounting for the Sermon on the Mount. If I believe that Jesus raised the dead in Palestine, I will feel that my foot is on a rock, around which I can behold a shattering universe unmoved, and from which I can calmly look until all shadows vanish, and every cloud of difficulty, looked upon by the morning light, rests radiant in a serene sky, visible only by its power to absorb the sunbeams.

And there is one point to be earnestly laid to heart : That beneath all doubt there must, in every case, continue to lie a certain immoveable and unquestioned foundation, or all is lost. There are two perils, each of fatal tendency, which beset the youthful inquirer on the way to truth ; perils against which it is no prejudging of the case to warn him, since they affect, not the attainment of any positive creed, or modification of a creed, but the very ability and will to search for such,—the very life of the soul.

The first peril, thus absolutely ruinous in its action, is that of sensuality : it is real and fearful. The young man has long ago left the kindly shore of his early belief, it may be the genial smile of his native home, and embarked on a wild and apparently endless voyage. The sky seems ever to grow blacker, the surges more wrathful, the howl of the bitter blast more melancholy and foreboding : he set out to reach the Happy Isles, full of noble hope and lofty aspiration ; but never has he at all approached them ; never, through the darkness and tempest, was seen the calm gleam of their resting haven, the welcoming smile of their fadeless gardens ; and now his heart sickens in his breast, with unsolaced yearning, with hope long deferred, in the scowl of that black negation which seems to press down on him from the whole starless sky : then there steals over the ocean a sweet, a witching melody, and he sees a soft light through the storm in the distance, streaming gently as from a dwelling of peace ; lifting his eyes, he beholds the Syren songstress, with alluring smile, sitting at the door of her enchanted cave, baring her voluptuous bosom, offering the spiced and mantling draught. Here at least is certainty. The slow agonies of disappointed thought will be exchanged for the thrilling excitements of passion ; the unsubstantial and hard-won joys of truth, for the rude ecstasies of animal pleasure. Why in toil and anguish seek an inheritance for the soul ? Why look out into immensity, forward to eternity ? We are on the earth ; why not be altogether of the earth ? Much may deceive, but passion at least is real. The temptation is strong, and often prevailing. When it prevails, it can be only by a convulsive effort that the life of the soul is saved. For here there could be no doubt as to the meaning of the temptress ; the invitation was clear and unmistakeable : Turn from spirit to sense, leave faith for sight, bow down at the shrine of Belial, curse God, and die to all nobleness. While the mental atmosphere is pure, while the darkness is only without, while the “red lightnings of remorse” have never flashed within, and self-contempt is not added to that of others, there is good hope that the haven of a believing, working manhood may be gained ; but from the rocks of the Syrens who ever returned ?

The second peril is perhaps still more desperate ;—the abandonment of earnestness, the lapse into a harmless but purposeless scepticism. Concerning much a man may question, but of this he must not entertain any doubt ; that the universe is not a dream, a phantasmagoria, an aimless, incomprehensible nothing ; but a reality. He shall always believe that, whatever his uncertainty, truth is immoveable and immortal. There is thus a refuge for faith in the wildest discord of doubt ; and the very inability of the earnest mind to reach a definite and particular belief may render the more emphatic and even heroic an unwavering confidence in the existence of truth, in the verity of God.

“ Oh yet we trust that somehow good
 Will be the final goal of ill,
 To pangs of nature, sins of will,
 Defects of doubt, and taints of blood :
 That nothing walks with aimless feet ;
 That not one life shall be destroy'd,
 Or cast as rubbish to the void,
 When God hath made the pile complete :
 That not a worm is cloven in vain ;
 That not a moth with vain desire
 Is shrivell'd in a fruitless fire,
 Or but subserves another's gain.”

Once this faith is lost ; once a man comes to question whether there is an earnest purpose in this universe at all ; when it is no longer of his own path across the deep, or his own powers of navigation, that he doubts, but of the very existence of a celestial vault above those clouds, with its immoveable lights burning round the throne of God ; then he is in evil case. Here, too, he finds rest ; but it is only a degree nobler than the rest of sensualism ; it is the rest of an easy, careless, blunt indifference, an acceptance of the good things of the day, a consent not to push sternly forward in an undeviating path, but lightly and laughingly to “gyrate,” like M. Maurepas. Is it uncommon, either in literature or in society, to observe the working of such a spirit as this ? Does there not subsist in our age a certain scepticism, good-humoured from its very completeness, and extremely clever and gentlemanly, which would laughingly aim its darts at the very heart of truth ? All loftiness of emotion, all earnest prizing of spiritual belief, is genially bantered aside. Truth may be very good, but its pursuit is so tantalizing ; one gets on to satisfaction without troubling himself about profound faith ; intensity of feeling is a sign of youth, or affectation, or feeble enthusiasm ; the nil admirari mood, the abnegation of all reverence and wonder, befits the smart member of polite society ; honesty consists in making no pretence to earnestness. And then wit survives ; on everything there can be hung a jest ; from the star to the grass blade, all things can be covered with the flickering light of clever and kindly banter. It is by no means unpleasant to meet a disciple of this school ; he is sure to be witty, cheery, sparkling, devoid of all pretence, blithe as a canary. No less exhilarating is the same spirit when breathed from the page of literature. Yet this whole phenomenon is one of unquestionable sadness ; perhaps few things could be more melancholy. Fichte and Carlyle proclaim rightly that there is a grandeur in noble sorrow : it is ill with him who is incapable of spiritual anguish, even of lofty despair. That very pain is a proof of devotion to truth ; as the keenness of the slighted lover's distress tests the depth of his affection. Better bow before a veiled Isis than care not whether the Divine can be known at all ! This is the second peril ; and many there are in our day whose best existence, whose soul's life, is by it put in jeopardy.

But for him who doubts sincerely, and will nowise fail from his faith in truth itself, there may be ordained the breaking forth of a great glory of deliverance and of dawn. True it is, his doubt is to be hated, and he can never fairly take the road until it is no more. But the brightness of the morning may be proportioned to the length and the darkness of the night. The overwearied dove had long winged its aimless way over an earth that was a waste of waters, under a streaming and darkened sky ; and now its tired pinions flapped heavily, the heart within had almost failed, the last ray of hope was fading from the eye ; but even then the olive twig emerged, and from a rift in the thick cloud a beam of light fell on the fainting breast, and gradually the earth again unveiled her face, and the triumphant embrace of the returning light kindled a glory which eclipsed all other dawns.

In the following chapters of this book we shall, amid much else, have occasion to note several of the phases of Modern Doubt, and to observe whether and how the Christian life can spring amidst it, and triumph over it.

JOHN FOSTER.

JOHN FOSTER, peasant in the west of Yorkshire, and father of the John Foster with whom we are concerned, was one of those undoubting Christians whose lives, unnoticed by the world, and unconsciously to themselves, are yet faithful transcripts from apostolic or patriarchal times. He no more questioned the stability of that path on which he went towards eternity, than he questioned the firmness of the ground along which, with solid measured tread, he walked to his daily toil. For twenty years before his death, he prayed every year that God, if it seemed good to Him, would terminate his earthly career. And this strength of character was finely shaded by a tendency towards reflection, a love of meditation and retirement. There was a lonely spot on the banks of the river Hebden whither he used to retire in meditative hours, and which became known as Foster's Cave. His wife Ann was the fitting spouse of such a husband. Her piety was of the same order as his; her decision still more conspicuous. One day, before their marriage, Mr Foster happened in her presence to be in a desponding mood. "I cannot," he said, "keep a wife."—"Then I will work and keep my husband," rejoined Ann.

On the 17th of September 1770, their son John was born.

It soon became evident that the child inherited more or less the disposition of either parent. He was a quiet, retiring boy, who loved to separate himself from the boisterous circle of youthful mirth, and to commune with his heart alone ; his sympathies were not diffusive, his likings were few ; we hear but of one friend of his own age ; he lacked the glad buoyancy of early youth, and soon learned to wander musing by the brook side or in the lonely wood. In this we recognise the son of that John Foster who used to meditate and to pray in the cave beside the murmuring Hebdon. He was, however, nowise destitute of acute feelings or strong energies : here he took after his other parent. When he did love or hate, he did either well.

But it soon became manifest that he possessed elements of character distinctively his own. He was not merely shy and silent, heedless of boyish sports ; he was not only an observant, sagacious, precociously wise, and, as neighbours said, "old-fashioned" little man : he was conscious, besides, of feelings with which no sympathy was to be expected from any one, —of pensive yearnings, and half-defined longings, which shut him, by the barrier of a strong individuality, from the throng. His sensibilities were tender to a degree rare in boyhood ; he "abhorred spiders for killing flies, and abominated butchers ;" his imagination tyrannized over him, painting to his eye the scene of torture, or the skeleton, or the apparition, until he shrank in loathing and terror from their ghastly distinctness. This delicate sensibility, manifesting itself in a fellow-feeling with every being that did or could suffer pain, and this eye-to-eye clearness of imaginative vision, were determining elements in his developed character.

He was about fourteen years of age when he ventured so far to unbosom himself to his friend Henry Horsfall as to let him know that the peace of his heart had been disturbed, and that it was only by taking to himself as a garment the robe of Christ's righteousness that he could regain calmness of mind. This was the turning-point of his life, the occasion of his first and irrevocably determining to enlist in the army of light. A long period elapsed ere his whole system of belief evolved itself, and many a change passed over his spirit before he finally reached a station in which he could calmly feel and act, unshackled by fear and unshaken by doubt ; but he had taken the step of separation, he had lifted his eye from earth to heaven ; and whatever change—of circumstance, of opinion, of feeling—may afterwards have taken place—however he may have doubted, whithersoever he may have wandered—this attitude was never altered.

When he attained his seventeenth year he became a member of the Baptist congregation at Hebden Bridge ; and about the same time resolved to dedicate himself to the Christian ministry. For three years he devoted himself to theological and general study in Brearly Hall, an educational institute in the neighbourhood. While here, he continued, as in his early boyhood, to lend his parents occasional assistance in their labours at the loom.

He now applied himself to the acquisition of knowledge with intense earnestness. For whole nights he read and meditated, choosing as his retreat on such occasions a grove in Dr Fawcett's garden. His mind was tardy in its operations. He performed his scholastic exercises with extreme slowness. But his efforts were unremitting and determined ; and no doubt it was here he acquired much of that extensive, though somewhat miscellaneous information, of which his works give ample evidence. Here, too, he was enabled to indulge his love of the various aspects of nature. It was his recreation to ramble in the neighbouring glens and woodlands. On one occasion he wandered for a whole night with a friend under the open sky, that he might note the varying features of twilight, of darkness, and especially of dawn. He displayed at an early period, what he continued to evince through life, a deep and genuine love of nature. In early days it led him to wander in solitary ways, while other boys were at sport; and in after years it caused him to speak of those unacquainted with the sympathetic emotions of a deep affection for nature, as seeming to want a sense. He loved every aspect of sky and earth; but the naturally serious cast of his mind was evinced by his preference of the great and gloomy. The glories of the moon streaming over the forest, and showing the dim crag, with its giant shadow in the slumbering lake,—the slow march of the laden clouds across the sky,—the cleft cloud, whose jagged edges were fringed with white fire, and from whose caverns issued the laugh of the thunder,—these fitted best his sombre yet vivid imagination, and yielded him the pleasure of a stern enchantment. But he had also a look of sympathy and love for more delicate and minute beauties. He would watch lovingly the kindling smile of nature as Spring awoke and opened the gates to Summer: he heard with a thrill of joy the note of the bird, and speaks often of the sky-people, the inhabitants of the summer sunbeams, that were such favourites with Jean Paul. Yet Foster's love of nature was perhaps never the passionate love of the poet; and the flow and freshness of its early manifestations were soon impaired by a habit of schooled and conscious observation. He exercised a careful supervision over his thoughts and impressions, striving to subject all the operations of his intellect to a "military discipline." He learned to observe nature with a certain constrained accuracy, to jot down his various impressions of her beauty, to gather analogies, similes, and so on; by which method, it is to be feared, coy nature will not be known. Foster was in all things too self-conscious. He would have the flower up to see how its roots were thriving. He would lay out his mind like a Dutch garden, all trimmed, and squared, and ordered. This is an important element in his character. It impeded that easy natural flow of thought and diction, it dulled that sportive buoyancy of soul, which indicate, as they spring from, an energy working much by spontaneity and impulse, a knowledge that has been naturally matured, and is ever fresh and verdant. We meet in his works with glimpses of insight into the vast region of our unconscious influences ; but he seems to have considered it his duty to order every movement of his own mind with an algebraic exactness ; he never fairly embraced and submitted to the beautiful and important truth, that the noblest education is that of sympathy, when, with viewless hand, she throws open the gates of the soul in order that the forms of beauty and the light of truth may silently enter in.

The acuteness of Foster's sensibilities has been already alluded to : another word must be devoted to the subject ere passing on. In no way is he more frequently or dogmatically characterized than by the word "misanthrope." This word is an absolute misapplication. It can be proved that, from his earliest to his latest years, his heart was tenderly, delicately kind. His sensibilities were not less, but more acute, than those of his fellow-men.

At first glance he appeared cold. It was natural that he should : the circumstances of his boyhood, and perhaps a constitutional tendency, determined it so. He had no very early associates ; his parents were far advanced in life, and did nothing to encourage the healthful sprightliness of childhood ; his brother Thomas was too much younger than himself to be his playmate ; he had no sister. The consequence was, that he grew up externally cold and self-involved. On his sedate and pensive countenance there was not that look of vivacious geniality, that flower-like smiling, which is nature's appointed expression and emblem of kindness of heart. He possessed no advantages of face and form, nor had he that nameless power to attract and please which makes some persons universal favourites.

Yet all this was in his case consistent with the fact that he was naturally one of the most truly loveable of human beings ; noble, gentle, tenderly affectionate. His nature, in its depths, had a far truer and deeper tenderness than that of thousands of genial, ever-smiling, companionable boys and girls. The proof of this is twofold : first, direct manifestations, on his part, of delicate sensibility ; and, next, that the supposition of an underlying tenderness of nature is necessary to explain, and sufficient for the explanation of, several remarkably prominent leanings and opinions of Foster.

Among the direct manifestations of genuine and tender kindness, we may place first his acute feeling of the sufferings borne by the lower animals. This is an infallible pledge of kindness of heart. In Foster's case it was a deep, constant, and considerate feeling. Very interesting also, in this point of view, is that sense of a void in his heart, to be filled only by a loved and loving object, which breathes in his early letters. He yearned with intense desire for some fully sympathizing heart. "Cold as you pronounce me," he exclaims in an early letter, "I should prefer the deep animated affection of one person whom I could entirely love, to all the tribute fame could levy within the amplest circuit of her flight." Again,—"Something seems to say, Come, come away ; I am but a gloomy ghost among the living and the happy. There is no need of me ; I shall never be loved as I wish to be loved, and as I could love. . . . I can never become deeply important to any one ; and the unsuccessful effort to become so costs too much, in the painful sentiments which the affections feel when they return mortified from the fervent attempt to give themselves to some heart which would welcome them with a pathetic warmth." These are the accents of a really tender, as well as noble nature ; of one which found no joy in isolation, although met by disappointment in the throng. Foster was not recognised by men in general to be kind ; but none ever came into close converse with him who did not know it well : there were deep and pure fountains of tenderness in his heart, but far secluded from the general gaze. There are wells among the calcined ridges of the Abyssinian deserts known only to the wild gazelle, and for which even the wandering Arab seeks in vain for ages. Many a man there is who is deemed hard and ungenial, merely because his kindness is hidden deep and cannot be approached by ordinary paths. Further and conclusive proofs of Foster's deep kindliness of nature will unfold themselves as we proceed.

At the age of twenty-one he left Brearley and entered the Baptist College in Bristol. His application here must have been fitful. "Probably," he says, writing to a friend in Yorkshire, "there never was a more indolent student at this or any other academy. I know but very little more of learning, or anything else, than when I left you. I have been a trifler all my life to this hour." But his mind was advancing. His letters testify to strong moral earnestness, to a stern and manly ambition, and to a ripening soundness of judgment. His eye was ever upwards.

He left the Bristol seminary ere he completed his twenty-second year. His education, which, so far as school and college were concerned, was now completed, must be pronounced defective. A general idea of the classics he had, but nothing more ; his memory seems not to have been trained by any systematic discipline, and, though by no means singularly bad, was yet a cause of complaint to him through life ; his reasoning powers do not appear to have been matured by any course of scientific or metaphysical study, and all his works bear witness to the fact. By miscellaneous reading, however, he had gained a large, though heterogeneous, stock of knowledge ; his intellect, while certainly giving no clear promise that it would ever be of that embracing kind which casts its generalizing glance over vast tracts of history, or science, or philosophy, had yet proved itself possessed of great natural vigour and shrewdness ; beneath all,—the substratum of his whole mind,—lay a radical honesty, a penetrating sense of reality. This last armed him with an almost irresistible power to pierce disguises and burn up moral and social cobweb and filigree.

Such, in meagre outline, were the boyhood and youth of Foster. We have seen him under the influences of the home and the school. We now arrive at that portion of his history which is in every case critical. We have to observe him as he emerges from the quiet region, and the still though powerful influences which have hitherto moulded his character, and enters a wider and more perilous sphere. The kindly words and glances of a godly father and mother, the friendly admonitions of Christian instructors, must give place to the rude teaching of experience. Till now he has been gently and genially swayed by influences exterior to himself ; he has gone on in peace and trustfulness, unconsciously leaning on the thought and knowledge of others ; not to any measure of excess, but rightly and blissfully, he has hitherto imbibed the impressions of his circle, and been what it is seemly for a boy and a youth to be who has been planted by God in a Christian family and a Christian land. But now his instructors are to be the many voices of contemporaneous life : his keen and susceptible mind is to be brought into contact with the agencies that ever work in the great world, shaping out the future ; he is to know what men in their various grades and nations are doing and saying, that he may manfully determine how it is his duty to speak and to act. He is to make his opinions his own, by taking them down for a time from those niches in his mind where the hand of parent or instructor had placed them, subjecting them to a careful and earnest scrutiny, and either replacing them or casting them away, by the free yet resolute hand of individual will. He is to know the agony of doubt. He is to be flung from youth's pinnacles of hope, till he almost discerns in the distance the dim Lethe of despair. He is, so to speak, to serve his apprenticeship to the time, to be made acquainted with its wants, its sicknesses, its conditions, its weapons, that at length he may step forth a skilful and well-approved workman, knowing what it is foolish or boyish to attempt, what it is imbecile or cowardly to shun.

For the accomplishment of this high object a period of ten years will not be too long. We shall take a broad glance along it, specifying a few of its more prominent influences, and endeavouring, in his own words, to trace his progress through it.

It will be necessary for us in the outset to ask, what were the great public influences of the time : the question can be briefly answered.

We have already had occasion to refer to the French Revolution. It is unnecessary to do more now than to note the extent of its influence. Every vein and artery of the social system, and that in all lands, felt that tremendous throb at the heart of the world. Thrones, senates, churches, felt it ; nay, to pursue the metaphor, every smallest capillary to which blood could circulate was affected, every unobserved assemblage where eye caught light from answering glance, every college coterie, every family circle. There was not a noble young heart in Britain but beat more quickly at the great tidings ; and almost universally it was the beating of exultant sympathy. The revolutionary fire went burning and blasting, and the eyes of the young kindled into joy and hope. " It is," such was the universal shout, " the breaking of the dawn ; the mists are retiring before it ; nothing but mist is dissipated ; presently the wide landscape, in a glory and beauty as of calm and bounteous summer, will spread away to our dazzled eyes towards the horizon of the future." They did not reflect that the path of fire is over a soil left blackened and sterile, where only the charred skeletons of the once proud forest remain, and that long years revolve ere nature kindly mantles it in green. Those were the days when Coleridge and Southey were building, of cloud and moon-beam, their notable fabric of pantisocracy,—the government of all by all ; where every man, as Louis Blanc promised, would keep his carriage. James Montgomery, in those days, found himself a dangerous person, and was immured in a prison. Wordsworth looked dark and dangerous. It was a strange and tumultuous time. The great era of doubting had finally come. All things were subjected to a trial as of fire, and antiquity seemed only to make them burn better.

Foster was deeply affected by the great changes taking place. Both politically and religiously, his opinions became unsettled,—one might almost say, wild ; while the turmoil and confusion in his mind were greatly aggravated by individual characteristics. For far different questions presented themselves to his mind than troubled other democrats. He pondered deeply on the human tale, and the unfathomable dealings of God with man. That insatiable yearning, which has marked the noblest minds, to penetrate the gloom that surrounds the destiny of man, to call a voice from the silence in which we thread our way through immensity,—that sublime want and disease which points to the state which is man's health, and the place which is man's home,—was a prominent and life-long characteristic of Foster. At first his ideas on these matters were confused, tumultuous, wrapped in deepest gloom ; for a time, a ray as of dawning light seemed to fall on them, and he was joyous and full of hope ; then this again proved but an earthly meteor, and no true herald of day ; finally, the gloom again fell in thick shadows, but in his own hand was a lamp which made him at least secure and calm.

“ At some moments,” he says, “ life, the world, mankind, religion, and eternity, appear to me like one vast scene of tremendous confusion, stretching before me far away, and closed in shades of the most dreadful darkness,—a darkness which only the most powerful splendours of Deity can illumine, and which appears as if they never yet had illumined it.”

Such causes of internal unrest complicated greatly the difficulties with which Foster had to contend. As yet the light of religion shed no definite radiance. He had not settled for himself the old question, put so emphatically in our time, “ What think ye of Christ,—whose Son is He ?” He was not absolutely sure whether He was the Son of God, or only the supreme of finite beings. He looked eagerly in a direction different from that where rested, calm amid all tempests, the banner of the Prince of Peace. He turned for a time to Thomas Paine. The first rude accents of universal freedom, which, rude as they were, deserve our respect, caught his ear ; he spoke of the “ rights of men,” and “ all that, and all that.” Nay, with a smile of amazement, we see the gentle, pensive, musing Foster, in Dublin, hand in glove with a crew of fiery democratic Irishmen, calling himself a “ son of Brutus !”

The aspect, indeed, of this whole period of Foster’s history is that of distraction and disquiet. There is a want of settled determination, of deliberate working energy, of manlike fixedness of aim. You mark in his active life the alternation of spasmodic effort with too great relaxation of mind ; and what remain of his writings of the period bear a similar testimony. There are flashes of strong discernment in thought, and striking brilliancy in expression ; of indications of genius there is no lack ; but we ever feel that this, as he tells us he was himself conscious, is not his rest. One thing, however, is always beyond doubt, and it is of a nature to impart to all deviations and distractions a deep value and interest. Through his whole life and thinking there burns the fire of an indestructible ardour in the search for truth, and a determination, come what may, to put up with no counterfeit; sacred and unquenchable, we see this glowing in his letters and stray sentences, a veiled radiance, but of heavenly brightness. Was not this the light that had been kindled in him when he unbosomed his youthful sorrow to Henry Horsfall?

In early life, "before the age of twenty," he commenced the practice of jotting down observations and reflections; of these he carefully copied out a copious selection, entitling them, A Chinese Garden of Flowers and Weeds. It is a strange medley, of great interest, and strikingly illustrative of the varying mood of his mind. It abounds in passages of beauty, and even of grandeur; at intervals we meet an observation on men and character somewhat severely true; his strong tendency towards the mysterious, his deep, devout earnestness, the excellences and the defects of his imagination, and his genuine, though somewhat restrained and impaired love of nature, all reveal themselves. He longs for what he names "an extensive atmosphere of consciousness," but which might be better characterized as a universal and tender sympathy, which, "like an Æolian harp," might "arrest even the vagrant winds, and make them music." Of a calm and beautiful evening we hear him say, that it is as if the soul of Eloisa pervaded the air. He reads Milton, and pictures to himself his world of spirits. He peers earnestly into the deeps of the olden eternity, and could even wish for death to snap the gravitation of earth: "I cannot wonder," he says, "that this intense and sublime curiosity has sometimes demolished the corporeal prison, by flinging it from a precipice or into the sea." Then, it may be, his imagination lapses into a wild and freakish mood : he figures himself, in great exultation, tossing on the waves of a flaming ocean, rising sky-high on the peaks of fire ; or, he looks on a file of clouds slowly and darkly trooping along the sky before the wind, his imagination transforming them into gaunt and sullen giants, that frown grimly to the smile of the interspersed azure. Presently, in milder and higher mood, he dreams of a visitant that comes to his earnest longings from the celestial choirs ; he walks in thought by his side, propounds to him the questions he has been gathering up for eternity, listens, in revering and wondering love, to every word in reply, and thinks that he has at last found his ideal friend and his satisfying informant. Soon he is again in the throng of common men and women, making his half-cynical remarks ; he gravely lets us know that, when he goes into company, he can see the ladies taking his measure, and thinking they have it, while he knows well enough they have not nor are capable of having. Some one speaks to him of a certain " narrow-minded religionist ;" " Mr T.," he replies, " sees religion not as a sphere, but as a line ; and it is the identical line in which he is moving." Sometimes his satiric fancy takes a wider sweep ; and, fancying the sun an intelligence, he figures his rage and disappointment at the miserable show the world turns out for him to light up, " a tiresome repetition of stupidity, follies, and crimes."

Foster's life, during this transition period, was externally as well as internally full of vicissitude. He went from situation to situation, from England to Ireland, from Ireland to England, and from England to Ireland again, without finding a permanent resting-place. His preaching was nowhere acceptable with the mass of the people ; instead of being a centre of attraction, he was decidedly a centre of repulsion, in the congregations where he ministered. He was really and deeply defective as a preacher. His manner was exceedingly bad.

I do not doubt, also, that a tendency to excessive refining made his sermons difficult to follow. The writer over whose page a reader can pore until he has analyzed every clause and paragraph, may trace what labyrinths he chooses to enter, and may lead his readers by what thin silken thread or what faint taper-light he thinks fit; but oratory of every sort, and none the less, but rather the more, pulpit oratory, demands the strongly marked line of distinction, the bold and massive argument, the clear, broad gleam of light. Of this Foster was never fully conscious, or, if conscious of the fact, and of his want, he yet failed to amend it. It might, too, be affirmed that his tone of remark had at times an air somewhat unnatural and far-fetched; not obvious certainly, but not perfectly natural; and freshness and nature must unite to produce literary excellence. However it was, he was unsuccessful as a preacher. He went from chapel to chapel in vain; his delicacies were rejected by the body of the people: they desired bread. There were generally a few who esteemed his teaching very highly.

To trace Foster's external career in all its changes during these ten years is uncalled for. His general course of life can be easily conceived. He spent much time in musing. By the banks of the Tyne, and in the meadows about Newcastle, he might have been seen, pensive and thoughtful, his eye often abstracted, yet at times lit up with a glance of keenest scrutiny and shrewdness. At Chichester, where we find him a few years afterwards, he used to pace the aisles of his chapel, in the silent moonlight, thinking earnestly; and it seems to have been in those still hours that wider and calmer views touching time and eternity, God and man, gradually opened up before him.

One or two extracts from his correspondence of this time will best illustrate his mental condition:—

“I sometimes fall into profound musings on the state of this great world, on the nature and the destinies of man, on the subject of the question, 'What is truth?' The whole hemisphere of contemplation appears inexpressibly strange and mysterious. It is cloud pursuing cloud, forest after forest, and Alps upon Alps. It is in vain to declaim against scepticism. I feel with an emphasis of conviction, and wonder, and regret, that almost all things are covered with thickest darkness, that the number of things to which certainty belongs is small. I hope to enjoy the sunshine of the other world. One of the very few things that appear to me not doubtful is the truth of Christianity in general." These are suggestive words. The earnest, religious Foster, gazes forward and around; in every direction he sees stretching away the infinitude of wonder, in which floats our little world, and his eye falls only on thick tempestuous gloom; he turns almost in despair from the clouded heaven, and longs for the sunlight of eternity. On one point he is assured: but it is not sufficient to give him rest and satisfaction. Christianity came from God: this he accepts as a general proposition. And while he doubts not of this, while he deliberately and immoveably believes that the Maker has broken silence in time, and spoken to the creature in Christianity, he is severed by an unfathomable gulf from every variety of mere philosophic morality, from all that can be called bare natural religion. Yet this is not enough to give him rest; general beliefs never bring stable tranquillity. He knows that God has spoken: but can a reasonable being, so believing, rest while he has no definite conviction of the import of what He has said?

There is progress indicated in the next, "Oh, what a difficult thing it is to be a Christian! I feel the necessity of reform through all my soul. When I retire into thought, I find myself environed by a crowd of impressive and awful images; I fix an ardent gaze on Christianity, assuredly the last best gift of Heaven to men ; on Jesus the agent and example of infinite love ; on time as it passes away ; on perfection as it shines beauteous as heaven, and, alas ! as remote ; on my own beloved soul which I have injured, and on the unhappy multitude of souls around me ; and I ask myself, Why do not my passions burn ? Why does not zeal arise in mighty wrath to dash my icy habits in pieces, to scourge me from indolence into fervid exertion, and to trample all mean sentiments in the dust ? At intervals I feel devotion and benevolence, and a surpassing ardour ; but when they are turned towards substantial, laborious operation, they fly and leave me spiritless amid the iron labour. Still, however, I do confide in the efficacy of persistive prayer ; and I do hope that the Spirit of the Lord will yet come mightily upon me, and carry me on through toils, and suffering, and death, to stand in Mount Zion among the followers of the Lamb !”

As probably every man of high moral and intellectual endowment, Foster, in the first ardour and poetry of youth, had looked upon perfection as it shone beauteous as heaven ; he had felt profoundly and unaffectedly that the world is not dressed in those robes of purity and beauty in which it could possibly have come from the hand of an infinite God. He recognised the universal imperfection, and felt it most keenly in his own bosom. At times his heart would burn with an ardour that appeared unquenchable ; he seemed to shout for the battle, and to rush out to confront the foe : but the world stood there in its armed and serried ranks, its thousand eyes looking stony defiance and inflexible hate ; he dropped his weapon, and recoiled before the iron labour. But he has made progress. A general belief in Christianity has become an earnest personal straining of the eye towards Jesus ; though all on earth fail him, and though his own heart harbours traitors, yet is there an ever-living Spirit of the Lord, and His ear can be reached by a mortal by persistive prayer.

“Every new reflection,” he writes, “tells me that my evangelic determinations ought to be, and every hope flatters that they will be, irreversible. Assembling into one view all things in the world that are important, and should be dear, to mankind, I distinguish the Christian cause as the celestial soul of the assemblage, evincing the same pre-eminence, and challenging the same emphatic passion, which, in any other case, mind does beyond the inferior elements ; and I have no wish of equal energy with that which aspires to the most intimate possible connection with Him who is the life of this cause, and the life of the world.”

Yet again, writing to his friend Hughes, he says :—“The gospel is to me, not a matter of complacent speculation only, but of momentous use, of urgent necessity. I come to Jesus Christ because I need pardon, and purification, and strength. I feel more abased, as He appears more divine. In the dust I listen to his instructions and commands. I pray fervently in His name, and above all things, for a happy union with Him. I do, and will, proclaim Him. For His sake I am willing to go through evil report and good report. I wish to live and die in His service. Is not this some resemblance of ‘the simplicity’ of the fishermen, on which you insist with emphasis ? This spirit, my dear friend, is in a certain degree to be, I trust, divinely augmented—assuredly mine. The Galilean faith has gained the ascendant,” &c.

“The Galilean faith has gained the ascendant !” After all doubting and striving, this is the resting-place ; he sits like a child at the feet of Jesus. Silently as the sleep of returning health, there steals over the mind of Foster that peace which was the legacy of our Master. True, his contentings are not yet at an end, darkness and dismay at times seem still closing round him ; but he now discerns his work, he now sees the goal, he can now measure the enemy’s force, and knows Who is fighting on his side ; stern as he may feel the contest to be, mournfully slight as may be his impression on the ranks of the foe, he knows that, one good day, the battle will be won.

His intellectual position he thus defines :—"My opinions are in substance decidedly Calvinistic. I am firmly convinced, for instance, of the doctrines of original sin, predestination, imputed righteousness, the necessity of the Holy Spirit's operation to convert the mind, final perseverance, &c. &c. As to the doctrine of the divinity of Christ, I do not deny that I had once some degree of doubt, but not such a degree ever as to carry me anything near the adoption of an opposite or different opinion. It was by no means disbelief; it was rather a hesitation to decide, and without much, I think, of the vanity of speculation. But for a long while past I have fully felt the necessity of dismissing subtle speculations and distinctions, and of yielding a humble, cordial assent to the mysterious truth, just as and because the Scriptures declare it, without inquiring, 'How can these things be?'"

Thus had Foster, now in his twenty-ninth year, arrived at that momentous epoch in a man's life when he can feel with a good conscience that his work is found, and that, until his allotment of time is spent, he is delivered from the fickle and distempered sway of change. The period of this consummation was auspiciously marked by another of equally happy omen. About this time he met one whom he could entirely love, and who reciprocated the affection.

A few words will be well spent in glancing at this last happy crisis in Foster's life. In judging of one who has been so widely characterized as a misanthrope and impersonation of cold intellectual sternness, it may be of some avail to know assuredly how he acted as lover, as father, and as husband.

The biography of Foster, by his friends Messrs Ryland and Sheppard, ought ere now to have dissipated the idea that he was unsocial. Possessed of delicate sympathies and high intellectual tastes, he was, of necessity, sensible of something alien and uncomfortable in an atmosphere of dulness, presumption, or frivolity ; but he enjoyed, with a more lively relish than is anywise common, the gentle, animating influence of noble converse.

This fact is attested, and the assurance we have that there was no total absence of light and poetical ingredients in Foster's character is confirmed, by his short series of letters to Miss Caroline Carpenter, a young lady who attracted his attention before he met her who became his wife. These are quite in the tone of a sentimental scion of chivalry. He waxes very gallant. He is not perhaps in exact drawing-room costume ; the clank of the chain armour may be heard, half-muffled by the silken doublet ; even in his mood of extreme politeness, he cannot be weak or frivolous. He does not attain a faultless ball-room idiom ; he has always had something to say, so that he has not had practice in the art of piquantly and simperingly saying nothing. Perhaps, for a man like Foster, the thing transcends the limited human faculties. "Pure, involuntary, unconscious nonsense," Southey thought, "is inimitable by any effort of sense." But no one can read these letters without recognising a fine youthful strength of emotion, a genial heartiness and warmth, removed very far from aught allied to austerity. Miss Carpenter died young.

It was not until he attained his thirtieth or thirty-first year, that Foster met the lady to whom he was afterwards married. She was a woman cast in no common mould. Her faculties and her will were powerful ; her feelings were of great strength, and rested more deeply in her breast than is usual in her sex ; her character was completed and crowned by earnest Christianity. She had entered regions of contemplation far beyond those of ordinary minds, and her deep musings on the dark and wonderful in human destiny had imparted to her character a stateliness and solemn repose. She was an earnest, intellectual woman, sensible to high ambitions, and fitted every way to be the friend and counsellor of a true man. Foster addressed his essays to her ; she could judge of them sternly and well. She was able to sympathize with him in his highest moments. Nay, she was perhaps by one shade too congenial with Foster ; another gleam of sunlight had been a clear advantage. A friendship such as can exist only between noble spirits arose between them, a friendship founded in natural, unforced sympathy, and growing by the waters of immortality. After two years of intimacy, it began to lose its name in the intensity of love, and they resolved to become knit in the closest bonds with which friendship can be bound on earth. Five years still elapsed ere they were married. Foster's preaching could not be depended on for a livelihood ; and it was only when he became permanently connected with the Eclectic Review, that he took home his friend, and called her wife. After five years waiting, he did this with signal joy. All nature, he tells us, seemed brightening around him ; Spring advanced with a new smile ; the very roses that wreathed the young year's brow caught new radiance from the dawning hope.

The married life of Foster was such as might have been hoped for. There had been no taint in the original affection. There had been no base thought of gold. Nor had he married in the blindness of passion. For this, too, is a fatally erroneous course. Men are to marry in emotions they share with the angel ; not with the animal. Foster knew that when, in the calm and real atmosphere of life, the fever of love's first intensity was cooled, and passion's fine frenzy had passed away, he would still see in the eyes of his Maria the immortal sympathy of friendship, deeper than sex, stronger than passion, fadeless to eternity. Perhaps the severest form of human sorrow, that which most nearly approaches the slow gnawing agony of him fixed hopeless on the immoveable rock, arises from marriage in which there never was any friendship, but the original bond was earthly passion, arrogating to itself, with the impudent lie of a harlot, the heavenly name of love. It is only base natures that are beguiled by the vulgar glare of gold, natures incapable of lofty joy or acute sorrow. But passion is a Syren of more winning song, of more fatally charming lure ; the warm, the impulsive, the noble, fall victims to her, and, after a short delirious dream, awake to a life of hopeless misery. Friendship and love must unite in every married union where happiness can be reasonably expected or truly deserved : and friendship is an affection arising from pure sympathy of spirit, independent of aught else. Let none look for happiness in marriage who are unable deliberately and firmly to declare, that it would be a happiness to live together for life, though they were of the same sex. I state this with some breadth, and do so with consideration ; I point to a hidden rock round which the ocean seems to smile in sunny calm, but on which many a noble bark has perished. Foster's marriage was such as beseems a man. The affection began in friendship ; and around this, as around a rod of heaven's gold, the flowers and fruits of earth's pure love, those tender joys and beloved interests which a bounteous and motherly nature fails not to supply, when man has rightly and valiantly performed his part, gradually and gracefully came to cluster.

“ In passion's flame
True love strikes root in reason.”

Foster was never compelled, in his moments of lofty thought and exalted sentiment, to withdraw himself, even by silence, from her who was to sojourn with him inseparably on earth ; he did not, in the presence of others, treat his wife's remarks as frivolous, or her opinions as slight : he found in her the sympathy, and accorded her the natural habitual respect, of friendship. And let no one think that their happiness was merely negative,—a monotonous and insipid respect or admiration, instead of the warm, enthusiastic, unutterable intensity of love. Love cast its golden anchors in their heart of hearts, affecting every pulse of their being.

And a genial home they had ; natural fountains of childish mirth and parental pride continually welling up within it. Long after his marriage Foster wrote thus :—"I have noticed the curious fact of the difference of the effect of what other people's children do and our own. In the situations I have formerly been in, any great noise and racket of children would have extremely incommoded me, if I wanted to read, think, or write. But I never mind, as to any such matter of inconvenience, how much din is made by these brats, if it is not absolutely in the room where I am at work. When I am with them, I am apt to make them, and join in making them, make a still bigger tumult and noise, so that their mother sometimes complains that we all want whipping together." The happiness here is very real. The fact of "these brats" being privileged is not unexampled. Jean Paul, when resolute performance of duty made him deny himself even his ordinary meals, yet professed his inability to deny himself the interruption of his children. No further refutation is required of what has been alleged touching Foster's sternness in his own household : this single passage, casting, as it does, a light before and after, is the condensation of a thousand proofs that every member of his family was a note in a perfect harmony, and that, in the fine music which was the result, the silver treble of childhood rung clearly and cheerily. Look at that father as he rises from his work, yielding to the fond and joyous impulse of his breast, snatching up his children, tossing them in the air, and becoming merely the biggest and loudest child of the group : then endeavour to suit the part he acts to the grave, stern, grimly intellectual Foster of whom you have heard.

A disorder in his throat, together with his striking unpopularity, made it now advisable for Foster to relinquish regular preaching. His virtual profession became literature. During a protracted life he brought his influence to bear on his age through the press. His residence was for the most part the vicinity of Bristol. There he worked steadily, in the heart of a peacefully happy home, cheered by the sympathy of a noble wife and the glad looks of his own children. In the following paragraphs, I shall endeavour first to define generally the attitude in which he stood to God and man ; and shall then more particularly refer to certain of the remarkable points in his system of opinion.

When the restlessness of youth began to settle into the seriousness of manhood, Foster seems to have looked more earnestly into "the abysmal deeps of personality," into his own soul, than ever formerly. He found it not what a spirit endowed with power to know its Author could normally, and by original intention, be ; it was an exception and anomaly in the works of Him who formed the lily and the star. And this imperfection he perceived to be singular in its character. The consciousness of himself and his race, written deep and ineffaceable, as in eternal adamant, proclaimed man to be a being, in such sense free, that he was responsible. The stain on the flower and the speck in the star were innocent imperfection : the stain on his soul was guilt. Man stood on the peaks of the world, where no other creature born of earth could come ; and, as to him alone it was given to gaze upward and onward to the infinitude of spiritual glories, so for him alone existed the possibility of an infinite descent. In so mysterious and awful a system of relations, it was of unspeakable moment that it should be certainly known that there was a living and governing God. This central truth seems never to have been questioned by Foster. Nor did he ever seriously doubt whether this God had actually and specially spoken in the Bible. His doubts attached mainly to the mode in which the word "Christ" was to be taken,—as the word of reconciliation, of explanation, of healing,—the explicative formula of the universe,—the ladder between time and eternity, between God and man. Whether Christ was God, or only a sublime created being, was for a time to him doubtful. He questioned, he hesitated, he speculated. But as his mind matured, and to the eye of contemplation the universe seemed to deepen and widen around him, he became gradually more and more impressed with the feebleness of human speculation, and the strength of simple, if honest and earnest, faith. He became keenly alive to the mystery which envelops human things when contemplated by human reason. The poor finite creature stood on his little world, and cast out the measuring line of his tiny intellect into the abysses of infinitude ; for a little space it seemed to live ; for one little moment it seemed to be piercing the darkness, like those darting threads of light seen in November ; but then it was swallowed up in the infinite hollow of the night. He heard afar the music of the redeemed ; he looked to the heaven of perfect holiness ; he earnestly yearned thither ; but guilt obscured the sky, and speculation could not pierce the gloom. The infinite value of a definite declaration on the part of the living God became then manifest ; it seemed plain to his uncontrolled reason that the Bible afforded such, in pronouncing Christ the equal of the Father, the Infinite God. If this truth was mysterious, it was at least certain : speculation, while unable to penetrate mystery, had at the same time promoted doubt ; but here doubt was slain. He accepted the truth in question. Believing definitely in the divinity of Christ, and resolving to take the facts of the universe as God had first fixed and then revealed them, he adopted the general system of belief which has been that of so many of earth's most earnest and mighty thinkers. He consented to see mankind as a drop of water resting in the hollow of Jehovah's hand ; he subscribed to all the essential articles of that reading of man's destiny and God's revelation, known now for several ages as Calvinism. Such was Foster's final religious attitude.

The political ground which he came to assume was worthy of himself as a man and a Christian. When the atmosphere of the world was all in vibration with the shouts of joy, of triumph, and of hope—when many nations seemed about to join in choral dance around a freedom arrayed in the snowy robe—when love was finally to become lord of all, and science, the minister of love, to vanquish even death—it was not to be wondered at that Foster, for a time, almost exulted in his humanity, and forgot the chains which may cramp and degrade the soul bound by no external bondage. He took up, as we have seen, with sons of Brutus and the writings of Tom Paine : perhaps the tough old world was to be renovated even so ! But the earnestness of his being, the singleness of his eye, could not but dissipate such delusions. Gradually the romantic light was seen to fade from human history and human nature. Like a true and valiant man, he dared to look until he saw the worst ; and as he gazed, with determined though saddening eye, he could not but perceive that a long dark cloud, murky as the smoke of hell, shadowed the generations of men ; that shouts of riot and revelling might rise above it, and gleams of wild mirth break through, but that, in general, it formed the fitting canopy of the lazaret-house, the scaffold, and the battle-field. The time when tyranny and misery were to sink into a common grave, he was compelled to allow, had not yet come. He awoke startled from his dream of Eden, as at the flash of the cherubic swords. But how did he act ? Terror-stricken, like a nervous child, at the shouts of blasphemy and the deluge of blood, did he tremble, and shriek, and rush back into the arms of the nurse, —into old Toryism, and the worship of “whatever king doth reign?” Having looked long on the mountain, did he conclude no Moses would ever descend, and bow down to the golden calf of despotism? No. He took a position worthy of a man who could look deliberately and choose firmly; who could hear above the dinning present the great voices of all time; a far truer position than many great men of his and our time. It was manlier than Southey’s, saner than Shelley’s, more stable and honest than Byron’s. He held by the great fact that, however defaced, however distorted, however contaminated, freedom is in essence eternally noble; and by the kindred fact, that despotism, however tempered, however embellished, is by nature poisonous and vile. For the present, the graceful and musical motions of the free had passed into the mad writhings and convulsive leapings of anarchy. But he did not therefore believe the devil’s elaborate lie, that, because he had power to bring evil out of good, it was a right and hopeful attempt to bring good out of essential evil.

“ Lord of unceasing love,
From everlasting Thou! we shall not die.
These, even these, in mercy didst Thou form,
Teachers of Good through Evil, by brief wrong Making Truth lovely, and her future might Magnetic o’er the fix’d untrembling heart.”

It were difficult to conceive a more striking or conclusive proof of the soundness and unimpaired vigour of Foster’s intellect, after having brought his reason reverently to accept “incredibilities,” than is afforded by the fact that, after the fierce revulsion in his ideas caused by the French Revolution, he still held, and continued with unchanging resolution during life to hold, by the standard of freedom.

When we come more closely to survey Foster’s system of thought, as displayed in his writings and embodied in his life, we are met by one great belief which casts its shadow over the whole. This is the belief in man's depravity. Human iniquity, wherever he looked, seemed to pollute all, to pervert all. There is a certain gloomy sublimity in his tearful gaze along the centuries. Where his eye falls, all seems to become dark. As a storm in the high Alps has been observed to hush the songs of the birds, and cast every gleaming point into shade, so earth's boasted virtue and grandeur faded in the look of Foster. You pointed him to the great and good of the past, the wise and heroic, whose names are the pride of nations : These, he said, were but the mountain-peaks, that rose, few and solitary, into the sunlight, while a world of ignorance, wretchedness, and crime, weltered below. You told him of the literary masterpieces of bygone ages, of sublime thoughts set in the perennial jewellery of poetic beauty : These, he replied, were flowers, for the most part gaudy and ungraceful, growing on a putrid mass. You spoke of the benign agencies which have been at work and are still at work on man ; of the powers of science, of the refinements of literature, of the gentle rain of education in the atmosphere of earth, and the sunlight of religion coming down from heaven : a sad smile passed over his features as he deeply muttered, There is a power in man's heart, when acted upon by the devil, to transform all these into "the sublime mechanics of depravity !"

This fearful thought was ever present with Foster, and was ever a fountain of woe. The sovereign power in man's nature he saw to have been dethroned, man's crown had fallen from his head, man's moral gravitation towards the centre of the universe had been mysteriously broken. Foster looked upon sin simply as an evil, an incalculable evil. Was he not right ? Is it not inconsiderate, and indicative of a want of sober and careful reflection, to indulge in such expressions regarding our fallen state as are met with in the present day ? Is not the individual and distinctive nature of sin lost sight of? It is spoken of as mere imperfection, as little more than what affords an opportunity or a battle-field for goodness. Whereas it seems plain that its peculiar nature arises from its sconnection with a free, willing being, as related to a supreme, love-deserving Father, that it is inextricably intertwined with the idea of personality, and that its least speck is in an essential and unqualified sense vile. The supposition of sin's existence in any world of God's creation besides our own, was to Foster an idea of acute pain; and I confess that I sympathize with him. I cannot but disagree with a brilliant and able, but somewhat incautious, writer of the day, in his remarks on this part of Foster's views. There may be sublimer employment to be found in the universe than battling to the death with the devil and his angels! It is unsafe to familiarize ourselves with the idea that sin came into God's creation for its decoration. From eternity to eternity, from world to world, sin was, is, and will be—damnable. There is, indeed, a sublime aspect of its connection with man's destiny, which Foster did not fail to perceive; it is a sublime office to battle for light, were it in a world that quivered on the smoke of hell; let us not shrink from the combat! But what we struggle against is eternally vile, and there is no sublimity, but endless shame, worthy of an agony to freeze our very tears, in much that it has entailed on humanity. Is there any sublimity in the fact, that a man cannot grasp the hand of his brother without the possibility of its one day striking a dagger to his heart? Why is it that the smile, and the complacent gesture, and the softly-tuned word, and all those dear emblems of kindness which shed a lingering starlight over life, can be mimicked, and debased, and turned into the dead paint of what is called politeness and etiquette, to hide the sepulchral rottenness of false hearts? When the friend you have loved for years turns treacherously against you for gold, is there sublimity in the fact? Is it not the agony of infinite shame that rises in our bosoms, as we read that the mode of expression which nature has given for the last speechless tenderness of love, was that by which a Judas betrayed a Jesus? Wander through the dreary vistas of time : look into the caverns of the Inquisition ; see the flames encircling that queenly maiden of eighteen who had rescued her country ; gaze into the swollen eyes of Beatrice Cenci ; stand by the scaffold of Leonora Schœning : then tell us of the sublimity of man's destiny. Look at that streak of hell-brought slime, foul and inexpungeable, darker than mist or rain-cloud on the purity of Mont Blanc, which blackens the lofty snow of Bacon's brow, and then speak of the sublimity of man's destiny. Worst, far worst of all, why is it that in our own hearts a hellish venom lurks ? The external battle were slight, if it were all. But it is not so. Why is it that we feel the suggestion of generosity ever cramped by some small insinuation of self ? Why is it that only at rarest moments can we rise to the feelings of noblest friendship with man, or pure devotion to God ? Why is it that, unless we are utterly lost to nobleness, or utterly blind to our own state, we are so often "replenished with contempt?" Sin has done all this. We have heard enough of sublimity ; let us change our tone a little. Not death alone, and pain, and disease, has this hellish agency brought along with it ; but as it were the very rottenness and repulsive horror of death ; ingratitude, cowardice, sloth, uncleanness, treachery. Sin is the blackness of all light, the defilement of all purity, the all-embracing formula for what is ignoble. Let us have self-denial and nobleness enough to hope that our poor world is the only tainted spot in the universe of God.

Foster's intense conception of sin is the key to much in his system of thought. This we shall find as we proceed.

We have seen that his ultimate belief was that which is commonly designated Calvinism. But there was one point on which he rejected its dogma ; he never believed in the eternity of hell torments. There are few passages in literature more profoundly interesting than the long letter in which he details his belief, and its grounds, on this solemn subject : of all the writings of Foster, it is that which at once reveals to us most of his character, and draws the heart towards him with the tenderest feelings of affection.

The source of his belief here was twofold : the eye-to-eye vividness with which his imagination painted before him the horrors of eternal destruction, and the trembling sensibility with which he looked upon any fellow-creature in pain. Both of these are revealed in the following brief, but inexpressibly touching, extract :—“ It often surprises me that the fearful doctrine sits, if I may so express it, so easy on the minds of the religious and benevolent believers of it. Surrounded immediately by the multitudes of fellow-mortals, and looking abroad on the present and back on the past state of the race, and regarding them, as to the immense majority, as subjects of so direful destination, how can they have any calm enjoyment of life, how can they even be cordially cheerful, how can they escape the incessant haunting of dismal ideas, darkening the economy in which their lot is cast ? I remember suggesting to one of them such an image as this :—Suppose the case to be that he knew so many were all doomed to suffer, by penal infliction, a death by torture, in the most protracted agony, with what feelings would he look on the populous city, the swarming country, or even a crowded, mixed congregation ? But what an infinitesimal trifle that would be, in comparison with what he does believe in looking on these multitudes. How, then, can they bear the sight of the living world around them ? ”

Read these words, and judge of the heart of Foster. With what a trembling, earnest hand, did he trace them ! What a world of tender emotion, of mild but intense human sympathy, of deepest love, they show ! And how beautiful, though sad, is the simplicity that breathes through the passage ! In perfect unconsciousness he writes, all unthinking of the rugged bosoms of his fellow-men, forgetful that each has his own little circle of work, with its own little circle of dust, encompassing it and him, and very much shutting out the rest of the world. Of a thousand men, probably not one has any definite conception of what the common belief implies. The imagination is too dull to conceive it ; the heart is too hard to feel it. But Foster's intense conceptive power led him in thought into the very bosom of hell ; there he saw human eyes fixed in the agony of eternal despair, there he listened to the endless, hopeless wailings of his brethren ; and his heart was steeled by no hard worldliness, by no wild fanaticism, against sympathy with their woes ; he seemed to feel that, were he himself among the celestial bands, the knowledge that those with whom he had once been a fellow-sojourner were in keen and everlasting anguish, would make him weep upon the plains of heaven. He thought not of himself ; all his pain and sorrow came of sympathy. If ever in the breast of man there was a heart more tremulously tender than a woman's or a child's, that heart was John Foster's.

Such was the source of his belief respecting God's punishment of sinners. The argument to which he was led can be briefly summed up. After painting fearfully the horrors of eternal woe, he deliberately adds : " I acknowledge my inability (I would say it with reverence) to admit this belief, together with a belief in the Divine goodness,—the belief that ' God is love,' that his tender mercies are over all his works." He did not pass on to a belief in immediate and promiscuous redemption : " On no allowable interpretation do they" (the words of Scripture on the subject) " signify less than a very protracted duration, and a formidable severity."

The above may fairly be said to be Foster's one argument ;

the aids he seeks from Scripture to his views are at best but attempts to open a path to a possible warrant on its part. And, in truth, it seems well-nigh the only argument of strength which can be urged on that side. Let it not, however, be thought that the position of those who adduce it is weak. It is not only strong, but, in one point of view, absolutely unassailable. If John Foster, or any man, deliberately and honestly conceives it irreconcilable with infinite love that God should condemn the wicked to everlasting punishment, I see not how he can accept the fact without blasphemy. If a man's reason, gazing earnestly and reverently, with lively consciousness of its own faint and glimmering vision, and full thought of the compass and might of infinite love guiding infinite power, is yet unable, I say not to justify, but to believe in, the possible justice of eternal torments, I see not how he can accept the doctrine. It is not lawful for any man, taking the sentence, "God is love," to use it as a fiery rod, though it were of celestial gold, wherewith to sear the eyeballs of his reason. One man, considering long, and searching Scripture, can, with no outrage on his moral being, embrace in one view the courts of eternal joy and the prison of eternal darkness, and believe unconstrainedly that the King who sits over both is Love ; such an one was Jonathan Edwards. But another man cannot do so ; and if he is as honest and reverent as the last, who is there on earth that can accuse him ? Deeply and solemnly earnest was Foster : one seems to see a dark cloud labouring along that letter, dropping tears on its way. I do not subscribe to his belief on the point ; his view was somewhat contracted, and, by a more mature consideration of what is revealed to us of God's dealings and designs in the creation of man, and a warrantable though careful borrowing of light from other quarters, it might have undergone important and advantageous change ; but how, with his premises, he could avoid his conclusion, I cannot see.

So profoundly difficult is the whole question of eternal punishment, and so intimately is it allied with a series of questions that have baffled, and surely will for ever baffle, human reason, that there is perhaps no conceivable case in which one would more carefully avoid peremptory or upbraiding dogmatism. Poor finite beings, treating such a question, may well bear with each other !

I do no more at present than offer a general and preliminary remark, defining, in some measure, the conditions of the question, and indicating what every man, in coming to a decision regarding it, has, so to speak, to take along with him.

In a volume of sermons, published some time since by Mr Theodore Parker of America, the matter is treated in the following off-hand, easy manner :—" You look on the base and wicked men who seem as worms in the mire of civilization, often delighting to bite and to devour one another, and you remark that these also are the children of God ; that He loves each of them, and will suffer no ancient Judas nor modern kidnapper to perish ; that there is no child of perdition in all the family of God ; but He will lead home his sinner and his saint, and such as are sick with the leprosy of their wickedness, ' the murrain of beasts,' bowed down, and not able to lift themselves up, He will carry in his arms !"

Is it possible to believe that there is not in this something essentially wrong ? Is the subject, then, after all, one of such wayside plainness, such fair and sunny simplicity ? Are the clouds and thick darkness that have from the olden time mysteriously veiled the future, and cast their shade over intellects like those of Luther, Calvin, Leibnitz, Pascal, and Jonathan Edwards, to roll away before a soft summer gale of sentimentality ? I cannot believe it. I can scarce conceive aught more diametrically opposed to the mightiest instincts that have swayed nations, and the most earnest beliefs which have been arrived at by great individual thinkers. What real thinker has there been from Plato to Dante, from Dante to Calvin, and from Calvin, I shall add, to Carlyle, who has not recognised something unspeakably stern, something to create a solemn awe, in the general structure and relations of this universe? Were nature all sunny and cloudless; were the sea at all times glassy and still, or the pathway only of the spiced and gentle wind, leading along the white sail as if it were an infant of Ocean; were there only soft flowery lawns and May mornings, and no volcanoes or avalanches; were there but the smiles of birthday and of bridal upon human faces, no furrow traced by tears, no wrinkle writ by age, no shadow cast by coming death; were human history one joyous chime, ascending from the green earth to meet and mingle with the angels' music, broken by no wailings of sorrow, no shrieks and groans of battle; had the slopes of Olivet been ever mantled with the vine, and rung only to the song of the vintage, and never seen the crosses by thousands in the grey morning; did the human eye, as years go on, gather brightness, and beam with ever a clearer and prouder gladness, and were it not a fact that the eye of every man or woman of well advanced years has one expression giving tone to the others, vanishing, it may be, for an hour, but always returning, and that an expression of sorrow; then might we have heart to join Mr Parker in his soft and child-like strain. But whenever we assay to do so, are we not confronted by immovable facts, by this one great fact,—MISERY; and does not our tongue then cleave to the roof of our mouth? Has it been all a mistake by which men have ever regarded death as dark and calamitous, and its infliction as the severest form of punishment? What means the smoke of those sacrifices rising from every nation on earth to an angry deity? Who put that word into the mouth of conscience, giving along with it a power to compel all men to listen, which declares man responsible, and the sinner in danger? Surely the assertion that these phenomena have reference solely to the inconveniences entailed on the sinner in this life requires no refutation. God has not averted the painful effects of sin in this world ; He let Judas go to his despairing death, and a devil even on earth gnawed the heart of Saul ; by what argument can we conclude that He will totally avert the effects of sin in the next, and place Judas and Stephen alike within the light of His throne ? “ Infinite pity, yet also infinite rigour of law : it is so nature is made ; it is so Dante discerned that she was made.” These are the words of Mr Carlyle.

Most of the ideas abroad regarding Foster have it for their basis that, even though his personal kindness were conceded, he must still, in his capacity as a public teacher, be pronounced morbid through excess of gloom. In a noted disquisition upon his character, it is sententiously stated that his tenderest emotions were acts of ratiocination. Perhaps precisely the most important lesson he conveyed to his age may be brought to light by inquiring into the truth of such statements.

Foster’s tremulous sensibility, and his vivid and sleepless imagination, gave him what may be called a perpetual consciousness of human misery. The misanthrope says men are bad, worthy to be hated, and deserving their sorrow : Foster also said men were bad ; but he heard love whispering that they were weak, and hatred for their sin was drowned in pity for their suffering.

To evening, but some heart did break.”

Foster seemed to hear it break. Do we not, as may be worth noting, see so much in his portrait ? Is not the expression which gives it tone that of tender, yearning affection ? Sorrow and misgiving are in the eye, but they seem to float in pity and love. There is something of trouble in the earnest, inquiring glance, telling of long pondering, and of a high curiosity not to be satisfied ; but there is neither indignation nor disdain. If the lip is faintly curled, it is not with contempt ; it seems to tremble with a sad and extorted confession, that human effort is all but vain in assuaging human woe. As we look, are we not vividly reminded of the lines by Keats :—

As if he always listened to the sighs
Of the goaded world ? ”

These words are precisely descriptive of Foster's habitual cast of mind. His face is not hopeful, it is not joyous ; but if one emotion is absent, it is that of contemptuous hatred ; and if one is present, it is that of scarcely hoping love.

Foster was a stern teacher. Looking with penetrative vision over human history, and entering by imaginative power into every scene and region of misery,—looking on ancient history, and seeing, “ by its faint glimmer,” that it had been “ an ocean of blood,”—and marking how, in modern times, even the celestial light of Christianity had but faintly and fitfully irradiated the gloom of earth,—he turned round, with the austerity of earnestness and the sadness of love, and proclaimed in solemn accents, that the world was no joyful garden, but a sterile desert, its wells few, its palm-trees faded, and resting, as under a sky of iron, beneath the curse. Let the shout of triumph, he said, die away : brethren, these are no cool, tranquil lakes ; these towers and palaces are not of pearl and gold ; these are but the mockeries of our sorrow ; no man of heart will look upon them ; beneath our feet is burning sand, and it is manful to know it ; only on the far horizon gleams the serene light of our home. Gloomy, misanthropic, only half the truth, say a thousand ; alas ! it is too near the whole truth, and of it we must be at times reminded. Easy it is to paint your world ; so infinitely easier, as has been remarked, to paint it an inch deep, than to amend it by a hair's-breadth. Heroism, virtue, domestic joys, rural bliss, the progress of the species, the sway of love, liberty, equality, and fraternity ; do you think Foster had not heard of these ? Yes ; and for a time he listened earnestly, if perchance there might be healing there ; and, even when disappointed, he held to the truth they shadowed. But how did his strong heart respond to the general advocates of freedom in our day ? How did Enceladus greet the soft frivolous accents of the gentle Clymene, who lisped her comforting syllables to the Titans ?

“ Not thunderbolt on thunderbolt, till all
That rebel Jove's whole armoury were spent ;
Not world on world upon these shoulders piled,
Could agonize me more than baby words
In midst of this dethronement horrible.”

There are few spectacles afforded by our earth more noble in their sadness than this which we find presented by Foster, and misnamed misanthropy. It is the spectacle of a man who looks over the ranks of his brothers as they wend mournfully through time, who feels a sorrow deeper than words, striving upwards to pour itself forth, but who sternly crushes down the “ climbing agony,” and compels his tears to burn only in his heart, lest they film his eye, and prevent the earnest gaze of thought from piercing into the evil. This, too, is among the duties of man ; to stand, like a kind physician, beside the writhing patient, mankind ; and, while listening to the groans, to mete the extent and virulence of the distemper, and, it may be, apply some remedy which will for the time increase the plaining. A man on earth may have too much love to weep !

The duty of man, as man, is thought. This is his distinctive regal duty. Pity and love may aid and cheer him ; but, as sovereign worker in this world, his duty is governance, guidance,—in one word, thought. And, in order to this,

“ To bear all naked truths,
And to envisage circumstance all calm,—
That is the top of sovereignty.”

No man is qualified to be a public guide or instructor of men who cannot more or less do this ; and a man generally is mighty in proportion as he can do it, and has a love strong enough to dare it.

But there is another aspect in which to regard Foster's gloomy representations of the human state and prospects. His position was twofold : in one point of view, it resembled that of the misanthrope ; in another, it was diametrically opposed thereto. He declared the work to be stern, the battle to be a reality. But he held earnestly by his standard ; he never flinched work. Hear this grand sentiment from his lips :—
“ All that pass from this world must present themselves as from battle, or be denied to mingle in the eternal joys and triumphs of the conquerors.” We know that he was tenderly kind, and he never for a moment flinched from the combat. This union absolutely negatives misanthropy, and the general notion which attributes misanthropy to Foster must be dissipated. He was a practical, living enforcement, with a new and peculiar energy, of the great lesson that every man must work. However dark the aspect of the field, though no higher hope exists for you than to lie cold and stiff while your brethren go on to victory, you must yet fight on. Comparatively easy is it to struggle when hope is bright, although this also is noble ; but far more difficult is it to know all the hazards and toils of the combat, to see no prospect that individual might will perceptibly avail, and yet to keep the sword unbared, and never dream of returning it to the scabbard. This is that high form of virtue which is missed by the real misanthrope ; and it Foster attained. He who comprehends his position here has understood his life ; here lies the problem of his biography.

We find this gloom, then, of which we have heard so much, to be a right noble, a sublime melancholy. In the strength of youth Foster's hopes had been high ; his eye had caught the distant gleaming of paradisaical fields ; he had seemed to hear the sound of millennial anthems ; his heart had swelled high with emotion ; he had shouted for the battle. But he soon paused in astonished sadness. It was as if a seraph had seen from afar the new smile of our planet among the stars of God, and had come through the azure to hear the notes of its new hymn of praise, and had landed on its golden margin, and been confronted by—SIN. The sorrow that was in Foster's eye has been known by the noblest of earth. It was that sadness which shaded the brow of Plato ; such sadness was in the heart of Solomon when he said that much wisdom was much grief.

Sorrow of this kind may not be absolutely required of us, nor certainly ought it to darken the whole character. With all her sternness, nature has appointed feelings of mirth to play over the dark places of our lot. A stern mother she is, a stern destiny is ours : but sometimes, nevertheless, she does take her children in her arms and smile on and kiss them ; she does intend us to yield at times to glad impulses, to leave our brooding, to look on the sunny side of the cloud. It is a fact that at every moment bitter tears are furrowing human faces ; it is a fact that at every moment, Night, with her shrouding darkness, is closing over half the world : but it is a fact also, that at every moment some are smiling ; at every moment somewhere Morn is scattering golden light. And, above all, the Christian may be removed from overwhelming access of grief ; he

Upon the breast of Faith ;”

he who can overarch all clouds and contradictions with an infinite radiance. But the calm rejoicing of the healthful and balanced Christian mind is removed as far as possible from flippancy or thoughtless gaiety. If our natures are of the sunny complexion, let us be glad and thankful ; but let us not forget that some of the greatest intellects of time have looked sadly on human affairs, or neglect the lesson they teach. Of these intellects, though not taking a high rank among them, was Foster's. He came near certain fatal influences, but he remained unscathed by all. He knew doubt, yet he was not driven into infidelity ; he saw difficulty, yet he was not driven into despair. He told men that the battle with principalities and powers was stern and long, and with hasty superficiality they exclaimed that he was wrapped in a garment of mere gloom. He shrunk in horror and agony from the baleful form of sin, as he saw it in the world around him ; by a sublime casting of the mantle of his love over the universe, he yearned to shut out from its rejoicing borders that mortal taint, and confine it to his own blackened world ; and they exclaimed that he was a misanthrope !

In considering the works of any powerful and sincere thinker, it is well to give a close attention to what in them is defective or erroneous. In tracing the line beyond which, by being pressed too far, truth becomes of no avail, or even, as extremes meet, rushes off to embrace error, we can mark well the lineaments of the truth itself, and comprehend, more fully than before, the work done by him whose writings we inspect. The mistakes, also, of a sincere man, and one of great influence in the world of mind, are more apt to obtain currency and produce evil, than those of one of slighter build : from gold it is worth while to separate the clay. I proceed, therefore, to state a few important defects in Foster's opinions and teaching, and to endeavour to evolve the full truth in each case.

In one word, he wanted completeness. His imagination, powerful, amazingly powerful, to draw a single figure, or a single spectacle, could not produce a full and harmonized picture. Passages in his works are, perhaps, not to be surpassed for lurid distinctness, for happy metaphor, or for clear force ; but he could not produce a complete book, or design a complete essay ; and what Dr Cheever says of his compositions, that they commence and end by no rule, and are governed by no principles of symmetry, is accurately true. His knowledge was various, and in its separate parts apparently exact ; but it was fatally deficient in method, it formed no complete system or series, beautiful to behold and easily referred to : it was like a museum packed up in the hold of a ship. His strictly intellectual power and his strictly reasoned opinions have the same characteristic. We are able to express in his own words the great principle, that "the conjunction of truths is of the utmost importance for preserving the genuine tendency, and securing the appropriate efficacy, of each ;" yet his system of opinion was by no means symmetrical. Each separate doctrine which he enforces has an aspect of truth, but often this aspect, by being made to fill the field of view, implies error. After all his pondering, he had reached no explaining theory, even of certain facts of history, which can, within limits, be accounted for, and whose allied good and evil can be discriminated. The truth of these general remarks will become manifest in the sequel.

Of the meaning and function, in the present stage of man's history as a species, of certain agencies, which must always, in their ultimate relations, be regarded with sorrow, but which subserve important purposes in the present dispensation, Foster had no clear conception. Of these agencies, by far the most remarkable is war. If all other arguments in proof of the fact that the species is fallen were swept away, the one great fact of war would put it beyond my power to conceive a man deliberately believing his species still in that state of perfection in which God created it. But if war came with sin, it came as the red-hot iron comes with poison ; to scarify and blacken, but yet to prevent pain from becoming death. When sin entered, a great severance took place ; right and might parted company. One in the bygone eternity, again to be one in the coming eternity, in the little vexed strait of time, tossing and weltering and never at rest, which lies between the two, they severed. To say might and right are one "in the long run," is to enunciate a truism ; to say might and right are one in time, traceably and exactly one in human history hitherto, or to be so ere the species is restored to its native condition, is to deny that ever a Helot was murdered or a child oppressed. When might and right become one, War will unbrace his armour, and lie down and die. But till then, War has functions to perform. These are various, but perhaps the most important among them is this : either, in a rough and rude manner, to vindicate outraged justice and let the oppressed go free ; or, in the blood of the lost battle-field, to inscribe a perpetual testimony to the right, and a stern and dumb appeal to Heaven.

How did Foster think and speak of war ? He looked over human history with a searching and a loving eye ; he saw war followed by a pale host of woes, and moving through all time to a music of bitter wail, making man its prey : he broke into a shriek of sorrow and indignation, and never went further or altered his tone. Now, it cannot be asserted, in proof of any man's being a thinker, that he has perceived the evil of war. Since themes began to be written in academies, that was known and discoursed of. Every schoolboy has a set of tropes to illustrate it. But a profound and deliberate thinker should see farther. A mere recognition of that great necessity which has been referred to were enough to silence a scarce manly and perpetual whining over the woes of war ; but a conception even of this is not to be found in Foster. Much less did he see how war has in many ages subserved other and benign purposes. Dear-bought, indeed, have been the harvests which its red rain has made to grow, but it has made them grow. Look upon Europe at the time of the breaking up of the Roman empire ; it is a case precisely in point. The appearance presented is inexpressibly awful : one scene of horror, of devastation, of tumult, from the gates of Constantinople to the pillars of Hercules. How far better had it seemed, how far higher had been the sentimental beauty, if things had continued as they were, if Rome's soft licentious slaves had gone on dawdling and lolling till now. But on that Europe God had other nations to be planted ; new blood had to be introduced ; and the northern hordes came down, sword in hand. It is an undeniable ethnological fact that, by the agency of the fearful wars which ensued, by the commingling of races resulting therefrom, the puny, emasculated subjects of Rome were exchanged for those nations which now, for more than a thousand years, have reared their mountain-like forms on Europe. Say, if you will, that God in that case overruled the horrors of war for the advancement of mankind ; this is, indeed, the more accurate mode of expression ; only learn to discern the mode in which He does overrule it, and say not that the devil alone had a hand in the matter.

Often amid the shakings of the nations, when men's hearts were failing them for fear, and in the bosoms of all the noble there was a speechless yearning for rest, God's Providence has been at work, the cloud seeming to veil love has been "itself love," and in the course of centuries the light of that love has beamed out perceptibly to all. What a profound significance now attaches to the following words of Milton, uttered in reference to that tumultuous time when "faithful and free-born Englishmen and good Christians" were driven in multitudes, from home and country, to seek shelter in "the wide ocean and the savage deserts of America!"—"Oh, Sir, if we could but see the shape of our dear mother England, as poets are wont to give a personal form to what they please, how would she appear, think ye, but in a mourning weed, with ashes upon her head, and tears abundantly flowing from her eyes." Were the eye of John Milton now to rekindle in its dry socket, what a gleam of glory would flash from it, as he gazed over to the "savage deserts of America!" How would he now robe in poetic life the figure of England, looking to the mighty nation to which she gave birth in pains like those of dissolution! How proudly would he now regard the Island-mother and her Titan son, entrusted by God with the high commission of bearing the standard of freedom in the front of the peoples! Would he not at least bow his head in wondering praise, and declare that, clearer and more powerful than ever song of bard, to justify the ways of God to man, is the silent roll of the ages?

There might be adduced considerations of a nature somewhat similar to these, to show that pestilence and famine are not unmingled evils, that even their steps are watched of God. Nations spring again with fresh vigour to their feet, after having been cast down. Through the branches of the pruned forest rushes the stream of life with wilder energy, and gushes forth in a fresh magnificence of foliage. No fact seems more likely to be soon unfolded to the careful student of history, than that after every period of winter has come a period of spring.

With such thoughts as these Foster had no acquaintance. He could nowise see his way through history.

It were foolish to conclude, from aught that has been said, that any pleading is intended on behalf of war, famine, and pestilence. These are doomed, and the sooner they go the better ; they point to a fearful chronic disease in the system of human affairs ; in the evolution of man's history, of God's plan in man's creation, they will vanish. Welcome shall science be, with her mild methods, thrice welcome. As war was the agency by which a sufficiently wide field was prepared for first planting the foundations of Christ's kingdom on earth ; as it was the sword of Rome which, all unconsciously of the end to be accomplished, fitted the world for Christianity in its troubled militant state ; it may be hoped that, when that kingdom is to be fully established, and the golden battlements of Zion are to cover the whole earth, the preparing agencies will be no longer those of war, but those of peace. Meanwhile, nothing is to be gained from immature attempts or Utopian expectations. Humanity is a patient difficult to deal with, and may require to be bled several times yet ; it will bleed no longer than until bleeding ceases to be a necessary agent of cure.

Reflections such as have been indicated are of great moment. They enlarge our apprehension of the wisdom of God, and show how deeply, yet unmistakeably, His designs penetrate the general framework of things : they foster a child-like, yet manful, confidence in the Almighty, and hint audibly, however the floods rage, that He sits King for ever : lastly, and in especial application to our day, they prevent men from fancying, as even earnest and able men are apt to do, that their time is the worst of times, and that the world is falling to wreck around them. They impart

That comes of thought and musing ? ”

they might have whispered to Southey, Arnold, and Carlyle, to possess their souls in patience. To proceed.

In all Foster's performance as a Christian instructor, there is no circumstance meriting deeper admiration than his downright advocacy of Christianity within the courts of literature.

He will have a Christian to be one in thought, word, and deed : he will listen to no compromise ; he will hear of no palliation ; him who is not with Christ he will declare to be against Him. So far well. As the old Judaistic preaching of law is obsolete, so the old philosophic preaching of virtue is obsolete ; law and virtue are both embraced, and, as it were, transfigured, in the doctrine of Christ crucified. But here, also, Foster's view was narrow and erroneous. He felt two powers contending within him. Gifted by nature with a fine sympathy for all that is beautiful and elevating, he could not but experience a thrill of richest enjoyment when any tint of real beauty met his eye, any tone of real beauty fell upon his ear ; but he had often met such in the spacious fields of literature, both ancient and modern, where he had extensively wandered, and these were, for the most part, unchristian ; the sovereign voice of religion seemed to say, that in these regions it was sinful to expatiate, and that every fruit to be plucked there, however clear and golden its beauty, must be an apple of Sodom. He took his determination. He uttered a voice of warning and condemnation. On all literature commonly called profane, he laid his ban. However pure the joy appeared, however distinctly it was from inner and native fountains of sympathy that the rapture seemed to flow, it was to be curbed, thwarted, cast aside, if the object of beauty which evoked it was not within some enclosure distinctly marked off for Christian purposes. In this his procedure is open to exception.

Two great departments of truth may be categorized and looked at in parallel lines, under the respective titles of laws of mathematics and laws of beauty. The limits of these departments, their points of divergence and of coalescence, are not our present concern. I have to speak of the laws of beauty, and introduce the laws of mathematics, for the sake of illustration. Both of them are absolute and self-dependent. No one with whom men would reason doubts the absolute character of mathematical truth : it has been questioned, but is here assumed as a fact, that the laws of beauty—what is commonly called æsthetic, and what Ruskin calls theoretic, truth—are also absolutely true. In other words, however much they may seem to man to fluctuate, these laws are the writing of the Eternal mind, and are more stable than the created universe. This is now, so far as I know, the belief of all our higher thinkers ; its being questioned so largely during last century was merely the exhibition, in the region of criticism, of that scepticism characteristic of the time. The natural and usual connection between sensational theories of morals and associative theories of beauty has been ably noted by Dr M'Vicar. The ancient and noble faith is, that the laws of beauty are independent of man and removed above circumstance, precisely as the truths of geometry. The laws by which the colours of the rainbow are mingled,—by which the draped elm-branch hangs,—by which the long sweeps of mountain curve are drawn,—by which the waves bend, and wreath, and dance, with the grace of new-born Cytheras,—are as firmly established in the mind of God as the laws by which He has hung the world on nothing. Supposing this granted, let us next inquire how the human mind, in its present shattered and enfeebled condition, looks at the respective provinces of mathematic and æsthetic truth. The process by which man has unfolded the truths of mathematics is comparable to the gradual removal of the clay, limestone, or chalk, from a fossil. Line by line, the encasing substance is removed, the plates of the old scales, the forms of the old bones, are displayed ; the instant a new portion is uncovered, it is seen perfectly, and without mistake ; nothing farther is to be learned regarding it. Exactly so in mathematics : as each new proposition is unfolded, the attainment is perfect, removed from the possibility at once of doubt and improvement. The human mind has retained power, by however long a process, to unveil mathematical truth perfectly. It has not been so with the laws of beauty. These may be compared rather to immoveable stars, fixed in the heavens, while far below there is a cloudy atmosphere, kept in perpetual turmoil by tempests, through which they can but gleam at moments ; up into the vault men gaze and gaze with their sin-dimmed eyes ; so wildly do the clouds roll and toss, and so feeble is their vision, that at times men are apt to turn away, and exclaim that those stars are not fixed at all, that they are mere stray meteors wandering through the cloud-rack. As yet no man has so clearly and conclusively fixed what their position and relative magnitude are, as to command universal assent ; but in no age has the eyesight of men been so dim, that stray gleams from them have not been noted, and sure though partial tidings of what they are obtained. The grand fact, however, to be remembered is this : That every gleam really discerned has been seen by man, not created by him ; has been a glimpse of a light of which God is the eternal fountain. For some reason, which we may well leave to His wisdom, neither the laws of mathematics nor the laws of beauty are in this world revealed specially to those who seek a re-attainment of sonship in God's house through Jesus Christ ; but, as the Christian believes in, and derives intellectual nourishment from, a new truth in mathematics, discovered by a blasphemer, he may rightfully and with good conscience look upon every beam of real beauty, though seen by an infidel, as a revelation of the thoughts and workings of his God. And the truths of beauty seem to be of a higher sort than those of mathematics. These last are the laws by which God fixed the pillars of his universe ; but beauty, we may reverently say, is His very garment ; and our greater ignorance of its laws than of the laws of mathematics is, no doubt, because, as fallen children, we cannot see our Father's face.

Truly glorious is the prospect opened up by the simple and sublime truth now feebly enunciated. It enables the Christian to go round the garden of poetry, separating the Satanic slime from paradisaical flowers, claiming all that is beautiful for his God. Thus is that teeming sympathy with loveliness, which Foster thought it necessary to restrain, nurtured to full fruition and perfect bloom. Thus all that the human imagination has in every age framed of true beauty, returns to the Christian in a new relation, and with new significance; every form of grace that the Greek saw in the dusky wood, or rising from the ocean; every fair mythic youth of Eastern song; every impersonation of summer dawn by Northern bard. The vessels of the Pagan temples, the notes of Pagan choirs, may be turned to the service of God, and even from the sterile desert of atheism be gathered angels' food. We shall see the stars though the night is around them.

The devil is darkness and defilement, but he never can cast his livery over, and compel into his service, one ray of God's light; the fact of a beautiful object's being beautiful, is equivalent to the fact that its beauty is from God; whatever opposition to beauty, whatever defilement, is exhibited by it, cannot extinguish its vital element; to say otherwise were Manichean. The flower that grows on the battle-field is as truly the work of God, and as perfectly reveals His beauty, as the flower that wreathes the Christian cottage; the beauty, where it is real, which has been seen and sung of by a Byron or a Shelley, may be taken by the Christian, with clear open mind, as a plant of God's rearing, though on an unwilling human soil.

The evil one must be beaten into his own grounds, and permitted to vindicate as his no spot of the territory of our Father. The earth was cursed in its relation to man; it was degraded from what it was to Adam,—a grand written scroll, its words the cloud, and flower, and mountain, the light by which it was read that of the sun and stars, wherein, as his own heart thrilled with the angelic joy that springs from rapt sympathy with loveliness, he saw the glory and the beauty of God,—into a field and workshop of toil, where man cannot rise, on the wings of pure emotion, into the heaven of loveliness, because of the brassy dome of labour. Yet the lilies of the field were not cursed in themselves, or made less beautiful ; their beauty was only veiled to men, so that they saw it not, nor were moved by it to a sacred joy ; and we may be absolutely certain, both that every thrill of rapture awakened in us by true beauty is a noble emotion, and that, when our nature is restored to what it was, or raised higher than before, a beauty will beam upon us from every part of God's universe, till then scarce dreamed of.

Foster's conception of the fallen state of human nature, shadowing, as it did, the whole range of his opinions, led him into views respecting the means available and hopeful for the amelioration of humanity, which seem of so dangerous tendency as to require a word of comment. He looked for light from heaven in a way in which it is not now to be expected, and in which it would do little good if it came. Casting his eye upon man as an agency for the regeneration of the world, his feeling of the depth of human corruption made him almost turn from the reforming teacher or preacher in despair. True, as we have seen, he never actually flinched, but he considered the world so bad, that no terrestrial mechanism hitherto known could save it ; he desired therefore, and expected, visible supernatural assistance. It is interesting to observe the eagerness with which he grasps at any appearance of supernatural influence to account for an extraordinary religious movement ; the look of suspicion with which he regards any act of general heroism is by no means so pleasing. He strongly insinuates supernatural aid in the case of Whitefield ; perhaps the coldest and smallest remark he ever made is that in which he seems to cling to the idea that the ministers of the Church of Scotland who left their manse in 1843 would give way when it came to the point. Foster had by no means an adequate idea of man, of his countless capabilities and countless diversities ; how, borrowing a hint from a clever writer, one might say he suggested the idea of a cross between an angel and a demon ; how the heaven-light and the hell-light mingle in his eye. And, for one thing, he had no clear idea of the mighty influence of man on man. He looked, to use his own words, for the “interference of angelic, or some other extraordinary and yet unknown, agency.”

The influence, both for good and evil, that may be exerted by man upon man, it were extremely difficult to overrate. The light from the human eye flashes along a column in the battle-day like a gleam of sunlight on the bayonets ; read the history of the “Little Corporal,” and you will know that to be a fact. The light of the human eye will set continents ablaze for centuries ; read the history of Mahomet and Islam for the proof of that. That light will bring the men of one-half of the world upon those of another, as the moon leads the tidal wave of ocean ; witness Peter and his Crusades. Think of the influence of Luther on the world, and of Whitefield upon immense bodies of men ; think of the sway of Knox in Scotland, and of his true successor Chalmers ; reflect, in a word, upon human history in its whole course ; and own the irresistible force of the conviction that the human eye and voice are the mightiest agencies which have acted there, whether directly as instruments of the Highest, or indirectly as such. Supernatural agency for the regeneration of the world is, indeed, to be looked for ; but such agency will not necessarily be in any other sense supernatural than it is in the conversion of every believer. Conceive the effect of a band of men with the ardour, the rapt earnestness, the immoveable valour of Paul, and the sacred enthusiasm of John ; by the laws of human nature, they would move the world as it has never yet been moved ; and what, save such graces as may be drawn down by prayer, do Christians now require, to be such ? Our Saviour set the human for ever on a level with visible, supernatural agency, by his declaration that, "If men heard not Moses and the Prophets, neither would they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." This truth is of very grave import ; for, if it is our first duty to avail ourselves of all aid to be had, it is our second to ascertain in what case it is hopeless to look for assistance.

These exceptions to Foster's teaching may be brought to a conclusion by a brief glance at the subject of amusements. These, as is well known, were, on the whole, an eyesore to him : even the sports and dances of children he looked on with a scowl of disapproval and discontent. It was not, indeed, always so : of that we have had satisfactory proof ; but he did not feel at rest respecting them ; any appearance of lightness, any approach to frivolity, in so earnest a world as ours, he could not meet with the kind indulgence of sympathy. He saw what is bad in amusements, but not what is good ; he perceived not the end they serve in the present economy, if not perfect or altogether excellent themselves, in yet averting worse evils, and at lowest finding something harmless for idle hands and feet to do. He fixed his eye too exclusively on the hollowness of worldly courtesy, and, while he sneered it away, he told us not what to put in its place. The present fabric of society is, indeed, crazy and infirm, rottenness in its rafters, flaws in its iron-work, cracks in its pillars ; but all must be better and stronger ere these can be dispensed with ; pull them out with the rash hand now, and all will go into a heap of rubbish.

What is the rationale of noble amusement ? what its method, and what its end ? In the mirthful meeting, it is intended, and should be, so far as is possible, attained, that the social instincts come into healthful and cheering play; that the latent fire of affection for our brethren and sisters, simply as such, by, as it were, the pleasing friction of concourse and converse, evolve itself on all faces in genial smiling or free laughter; that the frame, physical and psychal, sportively unbend itself without sinking into torpor, drawing refreshment and invigoration from a certain active rest, midway between sleep and labour. Such is needful for poor man, and nature has kindly given it.

Three radical errors, in three respective ways, may vitiate the philosophic perfection of amusement. The entertainment may be simply and exclusively animal; then it is ignoble in man: it may be simply mental; then it defeats its purpose: it may be destitute of true kindness, of trustful, friendly confidence; then it is false.

How do our public ball-rooms and large formal dancing parties stand the tests thus provided? Not remarkably well. True geniality is well-nigh absent. The kindness consists in becks, and bows, and ceremonies; in lispings, and simpers, and smiles; all of which were accurately put down in the dancing-master's bill. As in a farce, better or worse played, men and women act kindness. It is highly distinctive of the kind of entertainments now referred to, that mind is wanting. Was it not Hook who observed that dancing and intellect are in our island in an inverse ratio? It was a shrewd remark; and one thing upon which frequenters of ball-rooms, of both sexes, seem unanimous, is, that the particular persons with whom they have happened to dance were remarkably silly. All the inferior tribes have their amusements. Crows wheel round in the sky, sweeping in full circle, evidently in joyous sport; kittens and dogs are familiar examples; donkeys, be it known, are remarkably frisky when it is their own amusement they have to attend to; even sheep have been observed clumsily gamboling and kicking about in their thick woolly vestures, and have suggested the idea of a ball-room of ladies and gentlemen threading the wreathed dance in flannel dressing-gowns. The recreation of a ball-room may produce that quickened gallop of the blood, and consequent exhilaration of animal spirits, which attend the sports of the sheep and the donkey ; and the music and champagne may be allowed, in philosophic fairness, to set the ball-room, considered as a place of animal sport, perceptibly above the playgrounds of the last-mentioned creatures ; but, when you have no friendliness, no all-persuasive play of mirth, no unlaced ease and freedom,—when you stand to each other merely in the relation of necessities to the dance,—the pleasure, however heightened, is animal in essence, and ignoble.

Relaxing amusement, however, is noble and proper, whenever it bides the tests proposed. When you can trustfully grasp the hand extended to yours ; when you know the smile on the lip that addresses you to be the speechless voice of the viewless spirit of kindness ; when you can be assured that the tongue, now tuned to soft geniality and friendliness, will not to-morrow slander your name ; when mirth flows in its natural channels, and trustful heart leaps in sympathy with trustful heart ; then all is right. And if, in such an assemblage, the joyous exhilaration will be increased by moving to harmonious sound, with gestures of beauty and vivacious grace, let no one object to the dance : the buoyant leaping of the blood is nature's ; the laws of beauty in sound and sight are nature's,—who can say they are wrong ? The rain falls no less cheerfully because the sunbeams painted the cloud with gold and vermilion ; industry and action flourish all the better for this sporting in the sunlight of mirth and gladness.

I seriously invite all persons to consider the essential accordance of this with Christianity, with the example of our Master. Never smile passed from human countenance as He entered the abode ; never child ceased to frolic because

He was near. I speak seriously, deliberately, and reverently, when I say that if, in the degenerate state of the Jews at the time, they still retained any noble melodies commemorative of the days and deeds of the first Asmoneans, He would have listened while they were sung, without commanding silence, and would have sanctioned by His sacred approval the flow of manly mirth. Because worldly amusement, as we in general find it, is unworthy of men, let us not forget that the relaxing and yet re-invigorating enjoyments of social entertainment were never frowned upon by Him whose sympathy embraced everything beautiful and true in this universe.

True and legitimate amusement may assume many forms. Our tests exclude what ought to be excluded, but make room for all else. In the freest and best relaxation, the heart will naturally turn to what draws it most, and the devout Christian may find every essential of recreating social enjoyment in sharing with others the feelings of gratitude or irrepressible love to his God which fill his own bosom. As true recreation, as pure enjoyment, may be derived from the sharing of Christian feeling, as from any other outgoing of the heart, or rather far truer and purer. Were the hymns which, at early morning, the primitive Christians sung to Jesus, less joyful than the bacchantic choruses that had made night hideous a few hours before? Nay, this form of enjoyment will ultimately swallow up all others. Meanwhile, it is bootless to scowl upon amusements; by no single edict can they be removed or reformed. Only let us always keep the end in view, and strive to be in the path of improvement. As the human mind becomes gradually elevated, and the human heart gradually deepened, this and many other reforms will come in their season.

We have thus found not a little to qualify and supplement in the works of Foster. It were quite an erroneous idea, however, if these exceptions were taken as illustrative of the tenor of his works, or as testing their general value. The intention is rather to bear witness to their worth by endeavouring to free it of excrescence, and making it more accessible. His books are precious in a high and perennial sense. You cannot read any paragraph of them without perceiving that an earnest and lofty mind is at work. Earnestness was perhaps Foster's distinguishing characteristic ; over his page you seem to see bending the knit brow and indomitable eye of the thinker. This man, you feel, is conscious that it is a great and awful thing to be alive—to be born to that dread inheritance of duty and destiny which awaits every man that arrives on earth. He shakes from him the dust of custom ; he little heeds the sanctions of reputation ; afar off and very still, compared with a voice coming from above, he hears the trumpetings of fame : calm, determined, irresistible, his foot ever seems to press down till it reaches the basal adamant. This earnestness is made the more impressive from the manifest leaning of his mind towards the gloomy and mysterious. Of habits of thought deeply reflective, he retired as it were into the inner dwelling of his mind, there to ponder the insoluble questions of destiny ; like dim curtains, painted with shapes of terror, of gloom, and of weird grandeur, that hang round a dusky hall, waving fitfully in the faint light, these questions appear to have been ever present to his mind, filling it with solemn shadow : he looked upon them as on mystic hieroglyphs, but when he asked their secret, they remained silent as Isis ; he ever turned away, saying, in baffled pride, I will compel your answer in eternity, yet always turned again, fascinated by their sublime mystery, stung by their calm defiance. No word of frivolity escapes him ; he tells men sternly what they have to dare, and do, and suffer ; he never says the burden is light or the foe weak, but the one must be borne and the other must be met. You feel in perusing his works as in going through a rugged region, where nature, forgetting her gentler moods, desires to write upon the tablet of the world her lessons of solemnity and of power ; you perceive that only hardy plants can breathe this atmosphere, that here no Arcadian lawns can smile, no Utopian palaces arise ; there awakens in you that courage, you seem to be conscious of that sense of greatness, which the strong soul knows in the neighbourhood of crags and forests, where the torrent blends its stern murmur with the music of the mountain blast.

Foster is one of the best representatives of that literary Christian priesthood which is arising in these days. He did not leave his Christianity in the pulpit ; in his every book, and his every article, he speaks as one fully conscious that, by ceasing to preach his religion, he has not obtained any dispensation from the duty of proclaiming it. If asked to indicate what I would deem a fair specimen of that Christianized literature to which I earnestly look as to a fountain of blessedness for these latter times, I know not whither I could point with more decision than to John Foster's contributions to the Eclectic Review.

It cannot perhaps be alleged that there is any positively new revelation of truth in the writings of Foster. But they have the originality of spirit and the originality of application : the grain is the ancient grain of Christian truth, of manly sentiment, and of free loyalty ; but it has grown green in the showers of a new spring, and yellow under the suns of a new summer, and it yields a rich harvest, wholesome and pleasant as before, for the food of man. In an age when severe teaching was perhaps more than usually required, Foster recalled the public mind to those stern aspects and realities of our lot which it is never well to forget. His enforcement of the great doctrine of human depravity is in itself sufficient to render his works permanently valuable. And he was perhaps the first distinctly to apprehend and point out how certain of the great influences of the age are to be dealt with : he fairly understood the French Revolution, and proclaimed the necessity of universal education.

To criticise his separate works is beyond our scope, and would be superfluous. His style, even in its ultimate form, was unquestionably and definably defective. It never became capable of expressing delicate, sprightly, or buoyant emotion ; it wants variety, light graceful force, easy-stepping familiar elegance ; it has always something of an elephantine tread, and its gaiety is apt to remind one rather of the jingling of an elephant's trappings, than of the laughter of children ; or, to change the figure, it never spreads out into wide islanded shallows, rippling to the breeze, and sparkling in the sunbeams, but is always a massive, stately, slow-rolling river. Yet it possesses very rare and excellent qualities. It is remarkably rich and expressive ; you cannot skim along it. Almost strangely, too, considering its mass, it is by no means fatiguing. Continually and unexpectedly, as if nourished by hidden fountains, the flowers of a deeply poetic nature bloom forth on the page. And though it cannot be said to possess sprightliness, yet there is not wanting a pleasantly caustic wit, a quiet, earnest humour. Foster possessed a true vein of humour. Perhaps no style so deeply serious was ever so widely popular.

Foster's biography is essentially that of a thinker ; his external life was that of a thousand Englishmen. He was a shrewd, somewhat sarcastic, but friendly man, loving his friends and social converse, and deeply happy in his family. He excelled in conversation when in a genial atmosphere, and especially when any friend whom he loved and honoured—Hall, Fawcett, Hughes, or such other—was present. He took a deep interest in politics, lending all his influence to the side of freedom.

We noticed Foster's marriage ; we may venture to cast

one look upon him as he lays his Maria, mourning, in the grave. It was in 1832, and he was now sinking into the vale of years. No description of the joy of a long married life, where perfect love and perfect friendship have blended mortal and immortal joys in one pure harmony, could more pathetically body forth its felicity than the following words, written by him when first the light of the present drew away, to rest, like a sunset, on the past :—"I have returned hither, but have an utter repugnance to say,—returned home ; that name is applicable no longer. . . . There is a weight on the heart which the most friendly human hand cannot remove. The melancholy fact is, that my beloved, inestimable companion has left me. It comes upon me,—in evidence how various and sad ! And yet, for a moment, sometimes I feel as if I could not realize it as true. There is something that seems to say, can it be that I shall see her no more ; that I shall still, one day after another, find she is not here ; that her affectionate voice and look will never accost me ; the kind grasp of her hand never more be felt ; that when I would be glad to consult her, make an observation to her, address to her some expression of love, call her ' my dear wife,' as I have done so many thousand times, it will be in vain,—she is not here ? Several times, a considerable number, even since I followed her to the tomb, a momentary suggestion of thought has been, as one and another circumstance has occurred, ' I will tell Maria of this.' " One treads with silence and tears in the sacred neighbourhood of such a sorrow.

As Foster's life drew near its end, the sadness which had ever characterized him became more deep. He never wavered in his trust in God ; but he felt ever the more profoundly that this world is one of sorrow and darkness : he looked wistfully into the future, pondering upon the intermediate state and such subjects ; he walked sadly and solemnly, gathering up questions for eternity.

At last he came to die ; it was October 1844. On his death-bed he showed the same tremulous sensibility to the distress or annoyance of others which had always characterized him. He would permit no servant to sit up with him during the night, and if it was insisted upon, he could not sleep. The fact is little in itself, but of singular interest in the case of Foster.

The substantial peace which he had attained did not desert him in his dying hours. He died as one can die who has well acquitted him in the far sterner duty of living a true and godly life. As he felt his strength gradually stealing away, he remarked on his increasing weakness, and added, "But I can pray, and that is a glorious thing." Truly a glorious thing ; more glorious than atheist or pantheist can even pretend to. To look up to an Omnipotent Father, to speak to Him, to love Him ; to stretch upwards as a babe from the cradle, that He may lift His child in his everlasting arms to the resting-place of His own bosom ; this is the portion of the dying Christian. Foster was overheard thus speaking with himself :—"O death, where is thy sting ? O grave, where is thy victory ? Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ !" The eye of the terror-crowned was upon him, and thus he defied him.

THOMAS ARNOLD.

ABOUT the beginning of this century, a little boy might have been seen playing in a garden at West Cowes, Isle of Wight. The name of Napoleon and the din and rumour of war filled the air around him ; his keen eyes brightened and sparkled continually, as they looked out upon martial pomp and preparation. The sight of the great war-ship entering the harbour, or bearing away to seek the foe ; the news of battle and victory ; the loud, loyal choruses of mariners, who stepped and looked with the consciousness of ruling the waves : these, mingling with the kindly tones and melodies of a Christian home, which softened every harshness and discord into a musical harmony, were the earliest influences to mould the mind of Thomas Arnold. Though naturally bashful, the child was yet, so to speak, intensely alive, in body and in mind. He got hold of Pope's Homer, and the many voices of war around him strengthened its influence ; it was one of his favourite amusements to enact the Homeric battles, with staves and garden implements for swords and spears, reciting, with a great sense of grandeur in the proceeding, the speeches of the heroes of Homer, that is, of Pope. At eight, he went to Warminster School, at twelve, to Winchester ; in each he showed sympathetic intensity of intellect, heart and head acting strongly and in unison. He displayed great warmth in his boyish friendships. Ere proceeding to Oxford, which he did at sixteen, his information had extended widely. He had read Gibbon and Mitford twice, and was well acquainted with Russel's Modern Europe ; he knew also to a considerable extent the historians of Greece and Rome ; his bent, it was already manifest, was towards geography and history.

Arnold entered at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1811 ; it was an important epoch in his life, and his whole sojourn at the university is full of interest. The society in Corpus was select ; and during Arnold's career it embraced young men of a high and rare order ; such, for instance, as Whately, Heber, and Keble. He was an important member of the fraternity. He represented the healthful, well-balanced, daringly active English mind ; instinct with sympathies that passed beyond academic walls to expatiate in the wide world ; fond of poetry, and ardently affectionate, yet shrewd, discriminating, and burning his way through words to things. The air of Oxford was such as breathes through the Hall of the Past, and the great body of the students of Corpus, each in his several manner, loved and revered what was old ; but Arnold was for freedom and advancement, and rebelled against the genius of the place. Yet, one by one, the nobler of his fellow-students came to know him and to love him ; into one true heart after another he threw his invisible grappling-iron, and linked it to his for life. Corpus was a little senate in itself, where all the big questions of the day were discussed ; and Arnold was an active and vehement disputant. You can imagine him appearing at times even overbearing, but it was only when he was himself overborne by his subject. He could not hold an opinion by halves ; if it entered his heart at all, it was received with the warm welcome of hospitality, and defended at all risks. He was to be seen in the midst of a circle of the best men of Corpus, combating valiantly and cheerily for his own views against them all. The logical arguer would urge the danger of cutting the moorings of society, and drifting off on the revolutionary sea ; but Arnold would answer that it was only Conservatism which transmuted harmonious change into colliding revolution : the Tory loyalist, whose father was in Parliament, might expatiate on the glories of the throne and the nobility, as the ramparts of a nation ; but he would briefly answer, I love the people, and feudalism was wrong in its very idea : and then, in mild accents, might Keble evoke a faint cloud of golden dust from the treasures of the past ; and this he would summarily lay with some cold water from the wells of his favourite Aristotle. Yet his warm sympathies could not resist the strong and kindly influences of the place, and he became somewhat more Conservative.

Of his religious feelings during his abode at Corpus, we have slight information. His reading led him to Barrow, Hooker, and Taylor, and his heart was opened by natural nobleness to the more profound and enduring influence of Christian truth. His disposition was devout, his morals pure.

Altogether, the university career of Arnold is to be pronounced auspicious. If his scholarship was not what is technically called profound, it was yet thorough and comprehensive : he was not ignorant of words ; but that hungry instinct of reality within him, with which it was vain to contend, called resistlessly for things. He won the prize for two essays, Latin and English ; he became intimately and sympathizingly acquainted with ancient history ; and he drank in the wisdom of Aristotle with almost passionate enthusiasm. But the most benignant of all the influences which encircled him at the university, was assuredly the friendship of such men as Keble, Whately, and Justice Coleridge. These friendships were cherished by him during life with the earnestness of duty and the enthusiasm of love. It is a beautiful and inspiring spectacle to behold the several friends, as from their respective stations they send kindly and life-long greetings to each other ; like vessels in one fleet sailing towards the dawn, that hang out lamps of signal and comfort, to point the way and break the darkness.

When about to emerge from the years of youth and education into those of manhood and performance, Arnold's mind became more deeply moved than it had hitherto been on the subject of religion. He remained at the university for four years after ceasing to be a gownsmen. During these it was that his mind passed through a discipline of doubt, which finally resulted in the establishment of his character on a Christian basis,—in what he would have defined as his conversion. The precise stages of this all-important occurrence we are unable in his case to trace ; but his ultimate attainment was clear and decisive, the general method of his reaching it is perfectly ascertainable, and the lessons conveyed in it to similar inquirers, together with its testimony to the truth of Christianity, invaluable.

The special subject of his questioning was, as in the case of Foster, the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ. His belief on the point appears to have been confirmed by two main arguments : first, that the attempts made by those who rejected the doctrine to find for their views a warrant in Scripture were the mere mockery of criticism ; and, second, that the abstraction to which deism gives the name of God, leaves all-unsatisfied in the human soul that sublime craving which is its distinguishing glory,—that yearning pain which finds solace only in communion with the Divine. In order to his finding the former of these arguments conclusive, it was necessary that he should consider the testimony of Scripture final in the matter ; and the question arises, What were the grounds on which he received the Bible as the word of the living God ? The answer which can be rendered,—not perhaps given precisely at this period, and to be gathered, not from any declaration uttered at any one time, but from the tenor of his whole writings,—is singularly satisfactory. It is on all hands conceded that his historical acumen was piercing: his most obvious characteristics were clear shrewdness and sharp-cutting English sense; he had trained himself to investigate ancient writings by constant study from his boyish days of Greek and Roman authors; and, in the early vigour of his powers, he sat down at the feet of Niebuhr. He approached the Scriptures precisely as he did any other composition handed down from ancient times; he applied to them that criticism which separated the chaff from the wheat in Livy, and unravelled the intricacies of Thucydides; and he found conclusive evidence that they were the word of God. The reader may perhaps, in perusing the Biography of John Sterling by Mr Carlyle, have been struck with the effect produced upon the mind of the former by the perusal of Strauss's Life of Jesus. Sterling remarked, that, whatsoever men were going to, it was plain enough what they were going from; this German book, one is apt to conclude from his words, was to deal the final blow to all Christian institutions; the ears of the world, you suppose, are deafened with the rumour of it, the sky darkened by its mighty shadow. Of the same book Arnold wrote as follows:—

“What a strange work Strauss's Leben Jesu appears to me, judging of it from the notices in the Studien und Kritiken. It seems to me to show the ill effects of that division of labour which prevails so much among the learned men of Germany. Strauss writes about history and myths without appearing to have studied the question; but having heard that some pretended histories are mythical, he borrows this notion as an engine to help him out of Christianity. But the idea of men writing mythic histories between the time of Livy and Tacitus, and of St Paul mistaking such for realities!”

Thus it is that the matter appears to one really trained in historical induction. There is no "Coleridgean moonshine" in that eye! He sweeps through painted mist and carefully woven cobweb, right to the heart of the question. It is to no fond dreaming enthusiasm, very beautiful, it may be, but very weak, that he commits himself; he asks no aid from imagination, and he does not stop to inquire whether the plain fact, which his Saxon intellect demands, is given him by logic or by reason; he wants the fact itself. Grasping firmly, therefore, the hand of history, he finds his step at once on Judean hills; and he is surrounded by men who have the same hearts in their breasts, the same earth under their feet, as men in the nineteenth century. He fixes specially his regards upon Paul. He sees him trained in the school of Tarsus; he hears him, in calm, earnest, clear, persuasive words, disputing with Grecian sages; he notes that his opinions are so temperate that he becomes all things to all men; that his moral preaching is pure, mild, and thorough; that his zeal is stronger than death. He perceives that his every earthly prospect is blasted; his good hopes of advancement, under the smile of high priest and Pharisee, turned into certainty of bitter hatred; his life rendered one scene of hardship, danger, and poverty, by his belief in the Divine mission of a certain Teacher. He observes that he companies with men who declare that, a few years before, they saw this Teacher pass upwards into heaven, and had witnessed his raising of the dead while He went in and out among them. All is real, present, visible; there is none of the dimness of antiquity, the seclusion of mystery; these men sit there in Judea, unimpassioned, earnest, unanimous; there is in the whole scene no analogy the most distant to aught resembling a myth; the gospel they proclaim is love and truth; the danger they face is death; the motive they can have, on the hypothesis that they are liars, inconceivable; the life they lead, the unanimity of their testimony, on the hypothesis they are enthusiasts, positive contradictions : as with a stamp of his foot he shakes the whole mythic theory to atoms as an absurdity, to accept which were a feat of credulity within the powers of no faith save that of infidelity. There is a fine precision in Arnold's instant selection of Paul, as affording absolutely conclusive means of vindicating the strict historic verity of Christianity. The leading facts of Paul's life, as eliminated in the Horæ Paulinæ, are as well established, on their own evidence, as those of the life of Calvin ; and if they are granted, not only does every mythic theory dissolve like a film of vapour, but the first links of a chain are taken into the hand, by which it appears scarce possible to avoid being led believably to the feet of Jesus. Finding the historical evidence of the Divine truth of Christianity satisfactory, Arnold does not seem to have been able to doubt that Paul, John, and the other evangelists, do, with more or less explicitness, avow their belief in the divinity of Jesus. To this belief he was perhaps partially led, and in it he was certainly confirmed, by the second consideration which has been mentioned. It is exhibited in the following important passage :—

“For my own part, considering one great object of God's revealing Himself in the person of Christ to be the furnishing us with an object of worship which we could at once love and understand ; or, in other words, the supplying safely and wholesomely that want in human nature, which has shown itself in false religions, in ‘making gods after our own devices,’ it does seem to me to be forfeiting the peculiar benefits thus offered, if we persist in attempting to approach to God in his own incomprehensible essence, which, as no man hath seen or can see, so no man can conceive it. And, while I am most ready to allow the provoking and most ill-judged language in which the truth, as I hold it to be, respecting God, has been expressed by Trinitarians, so, on the other hand, I am inclined to think that Unitarians have deceived themselves, by fancying that they could understand the notion of one God any better than that of God in Christ ; whereas, it seems to me that it is only of God in Christ that I can in my present state of being conceive anything at all." Strangely enough, a Unitarian writer of the day has quoted from this passage against the doctrine of the divinity of our Lord. Is it not rather to be considered the subscription of a singularly clear, healthful, and honest mind to that great fact of the human consciousness, which is the chief argument deducible from nature in support of the doctrine of the Trinity ? It is a virtual appeal to the testimony of history that deism has ever failed to take a real hold of the mass of mankind ; that, when strenuously pressed by dialectic, its deity has become a confessed inconceivability, the absolute nothing of Oken ; and that, when left to gain a footing among the body of a people, it has taken the thousand forms of polytheism. The noblest of the Grecian sages did not point at nothing when he longed for more light, and dimly shadowed the Christian Trinity ; even the brow of Plato grew sad under the infinite vault, filled, indeed, with a certain pale icy radiance, but having no Sun. Christ came to lift the veil of Isis ; to fix the lorn eye of humanity on a known God. Arnold, by his revering love of the Saviour, and the satisfaction which he declared he experienced for the highest and most profound longings of his soul in the worship of Him, testified that the Desired of the nations had come ; through Jesus he could commune with his God ; holding by the hand of Jesus, he could stand unconsumed, as it were, in the very blaze of the throne ; instead of an argument in support of Unitarian views, his words afford one more proof that there is between poor man, lying in troubled slumber on the world-desert, and his God, the precipice of an unscaled infinitude, if no ladder is let down, if no divine Saviour has come. The end of all his doubt was, to use his own form of expression, his placing himself consciously under the banner of the Lord Jesus, his cleaving to Him, his reposing absolute trust in Him, his resolving to become His faithful soldier and servant to life's end. Then his mind became calm and strong ; he had, as he again says, "a security within, a security not of man, but of God."

Arnold now took orders in the Church of England, subscribing to her formularies. He professed not to agree with these in all things ; he specially dissented from the Athanasian Creed. Of his views on these points he never made a secret, openly declaring that no interpretation of the clauses to which he objected in the creed just mentioned could bring them into accordance with his opinions, and defining his act of subscription to indicate merely a general sympathy with, and willingness to adhere to, the Church of England. In this he erred. I agree with Mr Greg in believing him to have acted with perfect honesty ; yet his mistake was serious. I shall not discuss the matter here, but I refer the reader, for its masterly treatment, to Foster's article on the Life of Paley.

Arnold settled first at Laleham, near Staines, with his mother, aunt, and sister, proposing to take pupils. Here he remained for nine years, his character gradually unfolding, his views becoming matured. He disciplined himself to thorough work, and thought much. His eye, during the period, turned with ever-increasing earnestness upon the great interests and questions of his age and country, and gradually every Conservative tendency which had attached to him at Oxford was cast off ; he became the determined, uncompromising foe of every form of worship of the past, or attempt to clog the progress of the present. His religion, too, went on deepening from year to year ; he drew closer and closer to God, and to his Friend and Saviour Jesus ; and, more and more, the fruits of the Spirit beamed forth in thought, feeling, and action. At Laleham he married, and here six of his nine children were born.

At length Arnold was elected, in a marked and flattering manner, to the head mastership of Rugby. He was then thirty-three years of age ; in the very prime of life. He continued to occupy this post until his death, and here it was that he became so widely known and valued as a practical thinker and reformer. I shall endeavour to throw out before the eye of the reader a general picture of his life, for it is so alone that an adequate idea can be formed regarding it ; one or two of his more remarkable opinions may be thereafter specially considered.

The first look at Arnold's career reveals a very important circumstance, one which constituted a main element in his character, and exerted a great influence in moulding his career. It is impossible to regard him for a moment without perceiving the intensity of his physical life. This was conspicuous in his early days ; it continued to characterize him to the last. It made labour a positive pleasure ; it sent him to the mountain side with ever fresh delight ; it impelled him resistlessly to the work before and around him. Acting the Homeric battles in his father's garden, scampering over the fields at Oxford, bathing and boating with his pupils, he is ever the same intensely alive, joyous being. It is seen in his face ; he looks as if he were watching the moments in their flight, eager to grasp them ; his eye suggests that of the good Ritter Hagen of "the rapid glances ;" his lips are compressed and firm, as if closed after the utterance of one clear unalterable No, which Coleridge could not say ; there is strength in his firm unquivering cheek, in his iron brows, in his unwrinkled forehead. His intensity overthrows everything, even literary delicacy ; "I must write a pamphlet, or I will burst," he says : one sees him gasp with earnestness as he utters the words. It is to be found, likewise, in his valour and open-faced independence. He longs to fight the Oxford men, "as in a saw-pit." And he has a clear sympathy for the nobleness of the battle-field, thinking no man can be of sound human feelings without sharing it.

Directing attention to the sphere in which this tireless energy worked, and the modes in which it exhibited itself, we are called first to observe Arnold as a teacher. Both in theory and practice he is here admirable. The objects he aimed at in education may be summed up in two words,—character, power. By the first of these is meant complete, self-estimating, self-respecting manhood ; by the second, that harmonious development of each faculty of the mind, that raising of each capacity into the condition in which it can naturally, healthfully, and perfectly perform its function, which is attainable by intellectual culture. He avoided, on the one hand, the fallacy, that a man is not fitly educated unless he is made master of the powers, I say not the acquirements, of a scholar ; that, for instance, a man of slight intellectual faculty, like Howard, may not be as thoroughly educated in character as a man of high intellectual faculty like Bentley ; he shunned, on the other hand, the far more palpable, but extremely common error, which surely has exerted an unsuspected influence in our modern educational improvements, that education consists mainly in conveying a certain amount of information into the mind.

This statement is embodied in two brief but comprehensive expressions quoted from Arnold by Mr Stanley : first, "If there be anything on earth which is truly admirable, it is to see God's wisdom blessing an inferiority of natural powers, where they have been honestly, truly, and zealously cultivated ;" second, "It is not knowledge, but the means of gaining knowledge, which I have to teach."

ness and width, his practice of tuition may be characterized in one word as marked by its totality ; it embraced him as a whole ; it was in his step, and eye, and tone, and much which cannot be even indicated ; the pupils saw that their teacher was a true man and Christian ; the grasp of his energy they felt upon them ; they knew not how, but the very air seemed pervaded by his influence.

That continual watchfulness and readiness of mind, that never-flagging energy, that clearness and compactness of knowledge, and that genial sympathizing insight into the youthful mind, which are demanded in the practical teacher, were his in unusual measure. And his success was proportioned to his merits. His pupils were inspired with a fine sympathy with himself in carrying on the business of the school ; accustomed to be treated as Christian gentlemen whose word was not to be called in question, they learned to shrink from meanness, to acquire self-command, and to make intelligence and nobleness their aims ; at the university, youths from other quarters might excel in the quickness, the cleverness, and, it might even at times happen, the minute accuracy, of school-boys ; those from Rugby had the character, the thought, the deliberate purpose, of men.

But the expansive energies of Arnold could not confine themselves to the school. Around him lay the world in a stirring and tumultuous epoch, with its questions to be answered, and its work to be done. He was not the man to be struck dumb by the one, or confounded by the other. Christian himself in every pulse of his being, believing in Christianity as a truth, knowing it as a life, and recognising its claim to pervade with its influence every province of human affairs, he bent all his energies to effect that reform which it professes its power to work in nations. Allusion is not now made to his particular views ; attention is called to his attitude and aim. These present a spectacle of Christian thoroughness and valour which must stir every heart attuned to high impulses. He knows no fear ; he will listen to no compromise. To the world he seems even turbulent ; for he cannot breathe the same atmosphere with error, but must instantly unsheathe his sword, and rush against it : there is a flash of real war-horse fire in his eye ; he yearns for the battle. Words fall from him which a man may seize and treasure up as a sort of diamond-dust for whetting and burnishing his mental armoury. "I do not understand how the times can help bearing what an honest man has the resolution to do !" The opposition of the wicked to Christianity and the Christian ministry he regards as satisfactory, nay, consoling,—the only testimony in their favour which it is in the power of such to give. He feels that it is a grand thing to fight the devil, when one's mind is fairly made up as to the identity of the foe. "The work here is more and more engrossing continually ; but I like it better and better : it has all the interest of a great game of chess, with living creatures for pawns and pieces, and your adversary, in plain English, the devil," &c. This is a different attitude from Foster's, though that, too, was sublime. Foster looked over the field where the forces of the enemy were ranged, and gazed into the eyes of their "great commander," with stern defiance, indeed, but with a tear of burning grief that the positions of the field were in his hands ; Arnold's eye flashes right in his face with utter defiance, but also with a certain blasting gleam of triumphant contempt ; he longs only to come to close quarters, and, with the sword and the shield given him from heaven's armoury, to wrest the victory from the prince of the world. It is always the word "onward" that he speaks ; it is ever higher that he will have the banner float ; God and the angels may be spectators ; but, for us, up, brothers, and at them !

is recognised as in a peculiar sense English ; he embodied its indomitable energy, its unpretending honesty, its practical sense. In doing work he will be unmatched ; but he must clearly see what is the work to be done. When he reaches the Gallic invasion in his Roman history, he must commence the study of the Erse language ; but he never finds his footing sure among the abstractions of metaphysics, or even of mathematics. He attacks the evil that lies to his hand. He prefers in conversation a man who differs from him to one who agrees, because some work may then be done, and they end not exactly where they began. He claims no right or power to rule the empire of the air, and radically lacks the faculty of building air-carriages for a lifetime. "Before a confessed and unconquerable difficulty his mind reposed as quietly as in possession of a discovered truth."

In strict and beautiful accordance with the general firmness and health of Arnold's distinctively English character, was the love of nature which he displayed. It was not that sympathy which gives full occupation to the soul, and becomes the business of a life ; which casts over nature a spirit-woven web of sentiment and phantasy, more faintly aerial and more delicately tinted than a veil of gossamer, and presenting to the eye such new and wondrous colours, that men gather round its possessor, and hail him a poet. He could not anywise sympathize with Wordsworth when he said, that the meanest flower that lives awoke within him thoughts that were too deep for tears. This, he felt, was a little too ethereal, the spire melting into the mist, the strong, clear glance of a manly love fading into the filmy gaze of one that dreamed. But perhaps none ever illustrated with finer precision that strong and healthful sympathy with nature, which is a desirable, if not indispensable, element in every complete and harmonious character ; that unaffected delight in the beautiful, which sheds a dewy and flowery freshness over earnest devotion to the good, and wreathes with a green garland the brow that inflexibly endeavours after the true ; a power to hear, and to blend with the practical energy of life, those unnumbered lessons which are inscribed on nature's varied pageantry, and which we cannot doubt that God intended us to read. With the healthful, rejoicing, boyish affection of an intensely alive and happy nature, he expatiated in the magnificent home which God had hung out in the heavens for His creature man. He did not look upon it, as it is the duty and high privilege of the poet to do, with the feeling that it was his work to reveal its wonders, and, by a melody that leads captive every heart, to turn the eyes of men to behold it ; but he never ceased to look upon it with the eye of one who felt that he worked better in the consciousness that he dwelt in such a home, and knew that to the unstopped ear of man, as he proceeds on the journey of life, there arises from stream, and rock, and wood, and gentle fountain, a choral melody, to inspire, to tranquillize, to gladden. It was the ordinary English love of fields, and hills, and sunbeams, raised to more than ordinary intensity. His eye kindles grandly as he sees the sun pouring his broad, bright, parting smile over the Grampians, seeming to "tread on thrones ;" he has watched the Alps at eventide, and remembers for ever the sublime appearance of their peaks "upon a sky so glowing with the sunset, that, instead of looking white from their snow, they were like the teeth of a saw upon a plate of red-hot iron, all deep and black ;" he has never done looking at the great running rivers, which he regards as the most beautiful objects in nature ; the wild flowers on the mountain sides are, he tells us, his music ; it is Arnold in his kindest, but not least characteristic aspect, that we see, as we mark him walking by his wife's pony in sunny English afternoons, watching every phenomenon of nature, and doubling his joy by the sympathy of his Mary.

gious life, it is necessary to conceive fully that which was its central point, his close, conscious, and ever realized union and friendship with the Lord Jesus. His perceptions were all clear, his emotions warm ; he realized, with vivid distinctness, the living manhood of Christ ; and all that warm affection which found such dear employment in embracing his earthly friends, clung with exhaustless enjoyment and perpetual freshness to the Divine Man, whom as a friend he had in heaven. Of Jesus he ever thought ; the outwelling of tender love towards Him shed over the strong framework of his character that beautiful and gentle light which rests on the soul of him who has even one bosom friend ; for, in the throwing wide open of the breast to the eyes of another, in reposing perfectly in his honour, wisdom, and love, in humbly yet joyously knowing that he is every way worthy of your total affection, there is implied such a power of breaking the chords that bind you to self, such a power to identify yourself with another, to look upon your whole character through his eyes, and to estimate yourself by his fully appreciated and dearly prized excellence, that a noble modesty, a mildness, a manly tenderness, must more and more speak its influence, in voice, mien, and action. This is the natural influence of pure human friendship. And in Jesus, Arnold found, in faultless perfection, all he sought in an earthly friend. His eye went right across the intervening ages to look into the eyes of the Saviour ; he saw there that wisdom which silenced the gainsayer, that calm before which the tempest became still, that love which beamed through tears upon the weeping sisters by the grave of Lazarus ; he seemed to grasp that hand which supported Peter among the waves, and whose touch lit the seared eyeball. Or his eye pierced beyond the atmosphere of earth altogether : he felt himself walking by the river of life, in the midst of the Paradise of God ; and here, too, he saw that same Jesus, with those same human features and that same human smile ; and when, in the overflowing fulness of his heart, every expression of affection that might pass between earthly friends failed to express his emotion, he could, without scruple and with speechless joyfulness, bow down and worship Him. We noted that his heart had yearned after one in the image of God, and yet in the image of man, whom he could worship ; we found in that yearning the expression of a want common to humanity, and an argument against Unitarianism ; and now, when we see the yearning satisfied, may we not bid every Unitarian say, whether this influence, blessing and hallowing his whole life, is a delusion, and whether such warm and living emotions could flow from the sole and unrealizable conception of the infinite, the absolute, the one ?

But we must look at Arnold in one other and final aspect ; or rather, we must look at him where every other aspect is seen under a mellowing light, and all his joys blend in one perfect harmony. We have not yet looked into his home ; and, without any exaggeration, we may say, it was a sight for an angel's eye. It warms one's heart to think of Arnold's marriage and his domestic circle ; he was so precisely fitted for household joys. There is something comforting in the absolute demonstration, which his intense relish of life affords, that, bad as the world may be, and dismal as are the aspects of human society, there is yet a distinct possibility, beneath the stars, of enjoyment, serene from its very intensity, perfectly apart from the restless excitement of worldiness, or the melancholy delirium of passion. His home was a scene of unbroken, of almost ecstatic joy. You are continually reminded of its vicinity in perusing his biography ; stray gleams from its ever-burning hearth are perpetually wandering over his correspondence. With an earnestness that is the very voice of the heart, he exclaims, "My wife is well, thank God ;" and one is strangely impressed with the unconscious but true sublimity of his words, when he speaks of the "almost awful happiness of his domestic life."

It has, in all ages, been a prerogative of Christianity to plant and foster domestic feelings and felicities. The religion of Jesus walks among men, and offers them two great boons; in one hand she holds the treasures of immortality, in the other the blessings of home. Philosophy has ever been high, remote, and unparticipating; in her glittering robes, she treads in majesty along the high places of the world, amid a light that scarce mingles with earth's atmosphere, but falls on the eternal snow, a cold, intellectual light, which has never yet brightened the cloud of unspeakable sadness resting on her brow. A high task is hers, and we shall pay her all honour; but let us dwell rather with Christianity in the valleys and in the clefts of the rock, where she spreads the nuptial couch, and lights the household fire.

It is time now briefly to notice one or two of Arnold's principal opinions.

Arnold of Rugby will ever be known as a foremost champion of the belief that Church and State are identical. He regarded Christianity as the true test of citizenship, and at once withdrew from all concern with the London University when he found that his proposal for including Scripture in the entrance examination was not to be acceded to. He earnestly opposed the very idea of a Christian priesthood as distinguished from a Christian laity; he considered discipline strictly and appropriately a civil penalty; the idea of government propounded by Warburton, that it is a mere protective and legislative force, he deemed utterly erroneous. Arguing that the end of a nation, as of an individual, must be the glory of God in its own greatest happiness, he asserted that the sovereign power, that from which there is no appeal, must, without a solecism and almost a contradiction, be a religious power; in a Christian country, of course a Christian power. Let there, he proposed, be framed some general declaration of belief in Christianity, embracing the recognition of the Trinity, the inspiration of Scripture, and certain other leading doctrines ; let a certain diversity be permitted in the forms of worship ; let the Churches be occupied by ministers of various shades of belief and various preference of form, in the several parts of the Lord's day ; let the king be recognised as the head of the Church on earth ; and let all members of the Government, from premier to constable, be ministers of the Church-State.

Such was his scheme. It may well be regarded with wonder. It is true that he did not look upon it as at once realizable ; it is a fact that he cared little for any imposing aspect which might result from uniformity, if reality were sacrificed to attain it ; yet it is also unquestionable that no idea lay nearer his heart than the identity of Church and State ; while no desire moved him more strongly than the instant and earnest promulgation of his views on these subjects.

Arnold's views on this point contained too much truth to render it a useless or superfluous task to combat their error. Several of the minor propositions on which he insisted are extremely popular in our day. Particularly does this hold true of his proposal to introduce the external morality of a respectable life, in place of any allusion, tacit or express, to particular points of intellectual belief, as a test of Church membership. Few general declarations are hailed with warmer enthusiasm than that which affirms the panacea for our ecclesiastical ills to be this : To remove entirely, or to attenuate until all obstructing definiteness is removed, the dogmatic creeds of our Churches ; substituting some easy acknowledgment of the truth of Christianity, and a consideration of individual character. Not doctrine, but life ; such is the cry of thousands. Combined with an earnest desire for unity and uniformity among the Churches, this idea leads men of deep piety, and accustomed to reflect on the present aspect of things, to propose such modification of our creeds as would make Presbyterians and Episcopalians one, and, it might even be, draw an immense contribution from Rome. Combined with a desire to share the ease and respectability of national establishments, and a distaste for all religious controversy, it encourages men of unsettled or latitudinarian opinions to hope that their general, and, as it were, complimentary recognition of Christianity will procure them the name and honour of Christians. A few remarks may be hazarded on the subject.

First of all, attention is called to that principle, clearly discernible, and of unbounded range in our present economy, which may be generally designated, Division of labour : that principle which seeks the attainment of results by the balancing of forces, the harmony of antagonisms. The preference and pre-eminence which each individual accords to his own profession are certainly delusions ; yet is it manifest that these and similar delusions produce expedition and heartiness in the several departments of human work. Boldly extend the application of the principle : it is scarce possible to extend it too far. It will show the Almighty Governor of the world, in the inscrutable wisdom of His providence, educing in man's history the greatest good possible to a free but fallen will ; it will lead us to discern that many ideas of vital moment are kept alive by the jealous circumscriptive zeal of sects, and that a general ardour and activity are maintained by the really noble emulation of bodies making, though by different paths, for one goal ; whereas otherwise both might be covered up in the whited sepulchre of a vast and lifeless uniformity. We are fallen : we cannot, in speaking of man, take a step without acknowledging that. Truth does not here embrace the world like the great tidal wave, sweeping along in majestic calmness of power, and filling every creek and estuary ; truth rather descends fertilizing in many rills from the mountain side ; and it is better that it descend for the present even so, than that it should flow in one broad river, leaving an arid desert over all the land, save on its immediate banks. Were Christian zeal increased in each of the Christian sects, the earth would revive and bring forth fair flowers and fruits ; but, by the draining of them all into one huge reservoir, no good would for the present be done.

It would be well, next, to consider earnestly the intense individuality of Christianity ; its habit of starting, in all its reforms, from the unit, and not from the mass. Arnold knew the importance of those words—"The kingdom of God is within you ;" but he did not perceive their full bearing upon certain of his opinions. By the conversion of individuals the world will be regenerated, and not otherwise. This does not make the Church, in its visible form and appointments, of slight importance ; but it points out its grand duty, that of converting men, and shows the vanity of looking for a substitute for personal godliness in any mechanism or apparatus. The difficulty here presented is stupendous ; but it is precisely the one which must be met. Easy were it to renew mankind, and change the face of the world, if it could be done in a public way, by the devising of some magnificent and politic scheme of government ; then might the cornerstone of the new world be brought out in haste, and, indeed, with shouting (for should not we have found it ?) ; but the kingdom of God cometh not with observation : it is the silent unseen work, in the quiet parish, in the quieter heart, that advances it ; there is no waving of banners, no triumph of human wisdom. And its final glories will come when the Sun of the latter morn is rising : the golden walls of the New Jerusalem will be cast in heaven.

But in fact the matter turns ultimately upon this question, What sort of unity or uniformity is desired ? A reality or a sham ? A unity which will give clearness and wisdom in counsel, and prompt decision in action, which will fan gently the ranks of a sympathizing, consciously agreeing people, each individual strengthening his neighbour's hand ; or a flaring, meaningless banner, towards which every man looks with anxious suspicion, not knowing whither it leads,—a blazoned pretence, which makes each man unaware with whom he acts, and leaves him in the torment of loneliness, rendered three-fold more intolerable by the absence of that clearness of vision, and distinctness of aim, which redeem the evils of positive singularity of belief,—a perplexing and indefinable Delphic enigma, whose highest end is that ever contemptible one, to save appearances ?

Supposing any such scheme as Arnold's were carried into effect to-morrow, what were gained ? Would it be any additional union, that ministers who were wont to preach in different places of worship, officiated at different times, and to different congregations, in the same edifice ? Could it be expected that a month would pass over without discomfort and disruption ? Would any additional force be conferred upon individual effort by its being ranged under this tottering standard of patchwork unity ? What advantage might result in the assailing of adversaries is so slight, as to be almost impalpable to imagination ; while vast additional contempt would be hurled against any such Church, by a body of infidel assailants more closely united than ever. A Church acts through her members ; Christianize your members, and you invigorate your Church ; but that some unaccountable power would arise from furnishing members with a huge vapour-built abstraction, called a church, is incredible.

This whole idea contradicts and outrages certain of the deepest, noblest, and most ancient instincts of men. To erect the banner of truth, to leave no stain on the stars beaming there, and then to strive, in the face of scorn and hatred, to draw men around it and to carry it over the world ;—these are the perennially noble aims of men. To inscribe it with an ambiguous legend, to blot and stain its stars, to exclaim that it is of slight consequence whether men believe in it, if they only follow it ;—these are no sublime objects at all.

It is proper to obviate difficulty by observing, that all Arnold's reasoning from the Epistles of St Paul, even if granted to be unassailable on its own ground, which is by no means to be done, can be met by this altogether preliminary consideration : That the Epistles of Paul, and the other Epistles of the New Testament, are addressed to those already in the Christian Church, and supposed, ipso facto, to have acceded to the scheme of Christian doctrine propounded by the Apostles. It is not to the internal exercise of Church discipline, but to the original admission into the Church, that appeal must be made. And in that transaction, how brief soever the formula might be, it had no reference to the life, but to the faith. It was the believing acceptance of Christ which entitled any one to baptism. And if the simple declaration of belief in Christ were now as little ambiguous as it was then, the briefness of the formula, as well as its essential characteristic, might be retained ; but when a general declaration comes simply to nothing, when it would admit all men, from Unitarians to Methodists, who chose to name the name of Christ, your only choice, if you retain the essential nature and value of the early declaration by which a man was admitted to the Church of Christ, is, to make it more explicit.

It is, after all, more in consistence with the general constitution of human affairs, that a body of men should unite themselves under a test of doctrine, than by a test of conduct. There is no fact more certain, or more generally recognised, than this, That the spiritual life of a man, his internal world of belief, opinion, feeling, determines his spoken or acted life. "False action," remarks Mr Carlyle, "is the fruit of false speculation ; let the spirit of society be free and strong, that is to say, let true principles inspire the members of society, then neither can disorders accumulate in its practice," &c. If you wish to know a man thoroughly, you must know his belief: as he thinks in his heart, so is he. No great revolution in man's external life ever took place without originating in this internal region; all religions and philosophies address man as a reasoning, believing, not alone as an acting creature; and the fact holds eminently good in the case of Christianity, which came to the world offering salvation by faith in Christ, wrought by the Spirit of God in the inner man. It may be known, indeed, from life, whether profession is faithful; if one comes with "Lord, Lord," on his lips, you may know by his fruits,—you have no other means of knowing except by his fruits,—whether he really believes in the Lord or no. But if he declines even this preliminary confession, if he cannot say, in terms admitting of no ambiguity, that his faith is the Christian, you cannot argue from his conduct to his belief.

Those who believe that instant and universal harmony would arise from an appeal to a standard of life in our determination of the question of Church membership, may profit by a reminder that there are facts in ecclesiastical history to render their position more than doubtful. The history of Menno Simonis and his followers, in the period following the Reformation, deserves their consideration. Whatever lessons we may or may not draw from that history, we cannot fail to draw this: That to settle the standard of conduct will be as fruitful a source of disagreement as it has been to uphold that of belief. You will again have your lax and more lax, your old and new, your hot and cold, your good, bad, and indifferent (the latter tending to multiply); in one word, you will find that the formula for absolute concord among any great body of men is still in that undiscovered region where lie the philosopher's stone and the elixir vitæ. Unless, indeed, you are willing, for uniformity, to sacrifice everything else ; there is one magician whose wand will give you uniformity enough, on his own conditions ; will you consent that your Church be touched by the mace of Death ? The fact is, that we must bear in mind what we may call the melancholy immortality, the resurgent Phoenix nature, of error. Looking on former ages, one can discern, perhaps, an excessive tendency to rely upon creeds ; this perished, but, in dying, gave birth to what is equally an error, the disposition altogether to underrate them. Surely it is unwise to cast from us the fruit of the intellectual toil of centuries ; if it is true that creeds cannot save us, is it not a still more absurd mistake to conceive that theological indefiniteness will prove a salve for all our ills ?

The source of Arnold's general misconception on these subjects, and of much of the error prevalent regarding them, seems to lurk in these words made use of by Arnold :—“Sectarianism, that worst and most mischievous idol by which Christ's Church has ever been plagued.” This is at the very root of the matter, and deserves especial consideration. It is absolutely certain that there is a deeper evil than Sectarianism in the Church of Christ ; there is in all ages that tendency of poor drowsy humanity to fall asleep and hide its eyes from the celestial radiance ; there is that stagnation, that indifference, that death, wrapping itself in various coverings,—of loyalty to man, of custom, of respectability,—against which all that is good in Sectarianism has been the rebellion and resistance. Who, with the Bible in his hand, and the history of the Church to read by its light, can fail to discern, what, indeed, has been seen by a searching eye which has yet, alas ! looked away from the Cross to other hopes, that it is precisely the heavenly nature of Christianity as an individual work, its perennial and essential superiority to any form of belief or mode of practice, to any standard in morals or attainment in life, which can be asserted of a class, or transmitted by descent, which has necessitated the phenomenon, startling at first, but, when well examined, highly encouraging, that its every great revival has occasioned division and debate? Christianity has been a struggling light, a fermenting leaven, a purging flame; at its every revival men have striven, as it were, to crystallize it and still keep it hot, whereas it has indeed crystallized, but instantly began to cool. Were it not for Sectarianism, would not certain Churches have become absolutely dead,—decayed willow-trunks, hollow, dry as tinder, hoary yet not venerable? That divisiveness is in its nature bad, I would be the last to deny; that the strength of union is so great that the Christian ought to look well ere he foregoes it, is also true; but when our Lord Jesus spoke of his bringing division into the world, his eye glanced over the whole interval between that hour and the Millennium; and, though the unspeakable peace which He breathed over his disciples ere departing from them is ever to be sought after by the Church, and may at times blissfully envelope her as it wraps in its ethereal atmosphere the individual soul, yet she cannot hope for unbroken repose until touched by the rays of the latter morning. And this fact is of extreme importance, for instruction, for warning, for consolation. It is well that men be constantly reminded that Christianity is, once for all, essentially and eternally different from a power of respectability; that it has a perennial tendency to turn this world upside down; that it raises the soul into a region of other and loftier feelings and habitudes than can be attained by the embracing of any system or the following of any rules; that it is a walk of tribulation, gloomy with the frowns of kinsman and fellow-citizen. Christianity is a personal, real, and even awful agency, and no yearning for peace must be permitted to neutralize the effect of this consideration.

Though there is thus much to be questioned in Arnold's views on churches and creeds, it must be again affirmed, and with emphasis, that they embodied a great amount of invaluable truth. The prominence he gave to the great fact that priesthood, in all relating to mediation, intercession, or peculiar hereditary privilege, found its completion and conclusion in Christ, is sufficient of itself to impart value to his system. There is, perhaps, no idea in the circle of theological truth more glorious or pregnant than this. That every member of Christ's mystical body, His Church, is a king and priest to God ; that converted men are now God's Levitical tribe on earth, witnessing for Him before the world, and bearing censers filled with fire from off the heavenly altar ; that no Christian, whatever his sphere, can absolve himself from the responsibility and duty of preaching Christ in his life and conversation ; that the clergy have no power distinct from the Church, and are simply that part of it set aside, as fitted in a more marked degree than the others, to preach and to rule ;—these and kindred ideas would, if they pervaded the minds of Christian nations, so completely dissipate at once all superstitious reverence towards the pastorate, and all class opposition to it,—would shed such a spirit of true unity, and harmonious, intelligent content through our Churches,—would animate to such fresh and far-extended zeal in the efforts of all to spread the gospel of our Lord,—that no earnestness, no iteration, can be excessive in their advocacy and demonstration. All the writings, too, of this truly Christian man, whether on this or on other subjects, proclaim to the world the sad fact that Christianity has yet but slightly leavened its affairs, and call for a thorough penetration by its spirit of every province of things.

Contemplating the whole phenomenon of Arnold's belief in this Church-State, I cannot but conclude that he fell here into that mistake of noble minds which represents the world as by no means in so ruined a condition as has been deemed, and hopes for speedy amendment, by simple declaration of error, and proclamation of truth. Nature seems, as it were, to kindle this hope, in order that the young and ardent may go in full heart to the work, and not leave the world to absolute stagnation and death. Had Luther, when he felt the giant stirrings of the young life in his bosom, been permitted to catch a glimpse of those griefs and forebodings with which, in his latter days, he was apt to regard the state of the world, his hand had scarce been steady enough to hold that pen whose end shook the mitre in the Palace of the Seven Hills. The glory of exultant hope gleams over Milton's earlier page, yet he lived to mourn the evil days on which he had fallen, and to shadow forth his own stern sorrows in Samson Agonistes. All great and noble souls seem to have begun their work in hope, and ended it in sorrow ! Arnold could not even have given utterance to his scheme as a present measure without conceiving more favourably of men than their state warrants.

When death overtook him, he was, of course, as far from the attainment as ever. Towards the end he said :—" When I think of the Church, I could sit down and pine and die." He retained his opinions on the subject to the last, but was beginning to have misgivings. " I am myself so much inclined to the idea of a strong social bond, that I ought not to be suspected of any tendency to anarchy ; yet I am beginning to think that the idea may be overstrained, and that this attempt to merge the soul and will of the individual man in the general body is, when fully developed, contrary to the very essence of Christianity. After all, it is the individual soul that must be saved, and it is that which is addressed in the gospel." And again, shortly before his death :—" I feel so deeply the danger and evil of the false system, that, despairing of seeing the true Church restored, I am disposed to cling, not from choice, but necessity, to the Protestant tendency of laying the whole stress on Christian religion, and adjourning the notion of Church sine die." This is in the right direction ; in conformity with the spirit of the Reformation, in conformity with the spirit of the New Testament. The Old Testament dealt with systems and nationalities ; the New Testament deals with individual conversion, with individual life : the old dispensation had its kingdom of Israel, seen among the nations as a cluster of beams falling from heaven on one spot, in a dark weltering sea ; the new dispensation has its kingdom of God, noiseless and unobserved, in the individual heart : the old dispensation had its temple on Moriah, crowning the mountain with gold, and adorned with the richest and rarest workmanship of the ancient world ; the new dispensation has the soul of man for its temple, viewless, and, to the unpurified, unennobled thought, unimposing, yet sublime and everlasting. It is an unseen, a spiritual sublimity, that Christianity aims at ; its ineffable holiness enrobes the soul in an immortality which can even now be recognised to hold more of heaven than of earth, and to have no element which will not flourish best in the serene air of eternity : confound it with systems and hierarchies, with the pomp and show of visible ceremonious uniformity, and you overlook its essence ; there will be no end of your wandering. Let Christians awaken to convert the world ; that done, all is done ; that missed, though the world tottered under the weight of cathedrals, and the pile of ghastly uniformity had a base as broad as Sahara, all were lost.

Arnold's view of the office and education of the theologian in our day deserves a passing glance. He recognised the value of the human element, as distinguished from the barely theological, in the training of ministers of the gospel, the fatal danger that students of theology become mere discriminators of doctrinal correctness, mere defenders of creed and system, mere catechetical expounders of the truth, mere denizens of the school or library, failing to unfold within them that expansion of human sympathy which is the means in God's hand of the action of man on man. Soundness in doctrine is of vital importance; yet theological education must wander from the spirit of Christianity if it becomes a mere instruction and practice in systematic or exegetic theology. It is well that a fisherman can keep his net in order, perceiving and rectifying the slightest rent or weakness; yet the manner of casting the net is also of great moment; and it is too common to find young men armed at all points in exegetic and controversial theology, who yet fail utterly when they come to cast the gospel net out into the world. Christ called his disciples to be fishers of men,—to the grand practical task of world-conversion; when He sent out the seventy, His summary of doctrine was very short, while his detail of the method of their preaching was much more extended.

Arnold's political views need not long detain us. He loved politics extremely; he considered the desire to rule a noble ambition. The leading features of his system can be easily defined; they reflect well the main features of his mind, fiery realism, and statesmanlike constructiveness. He was one of the most determined opponents that Conservatism, in the various forms in which it has stereotyped itself, ever met. He deemed it always, in its essence, erroneous; to halt was of necessity wrong; it was only by progress, he would have said, that what is good could be preserved: proceed as slowly as is necessary for sureness; but pause on your voyage, and that moment your ship begins to rot, or the revolutionary tempest awakens behind, and then the acceleration is fatal. His words on the subject are deliberate and bold:—"As I feel that, of the two besetting sins of human nature, selfish neglect and selfish agitation, the former is the more common, and has, in the long run, done far more harm than the latter, although the outbreaks of the latter, while they last, are of a far more atrocious character ; so I have in a manner vowed to myself, and prayed that, with God's blessing, no excesses of popular wickedness, though I should be myself, as I expect, the victim of them, no temporary evils produced by revolution, shall ever make me forget the wickedness of Toryism,—of that spirit which crucified Christ himself, which has, throughout the long experience of all history, continually thwarted the cause of God and goodness, and has gone on abusing its opportunities, and heaping up wrath, by a long series of selfish neglect, against the day of wrath and judgment.” Again :—“There is nothing so revolutionary, because there is nothing so unnatural and so convulsive to society, as the strain to keep things fixed, when all the world is by the very law of its creation in eternal progress ; and the cause of all the evils of the world may be traced to that natural, but most deadly, error of human indolence and corruption, that our business is to preserve, and not to improve.” He challenges a wide induction :—“Search and look whether you can find that any constitution was destroyed from within, by faction or discontent, without its destruction having been, either just penally, or necessary because it could not any longer answer its proper purposes.” At times he breaks forth in a fine strong figure :—“Flectere si nequeo superos, Acheronta movebo,’ is the cry of Reform, when, long repulsed and scorned, she is on the point of changing her visage to that of Revolution.” From these characteristic sentences, compared with other parts of his works, we learn accurately his position as a political thinker. Selfishness in its two forms he shunned on either hand : the selfishness that will sit in icy and relentless indifference on its throne, though that throne be placed on a pyramid of skulls ; this is the selfishness of those for whom it has, in all ages, been hard to enter into the kingdom of heaven : and the selfishness which cries simply, give, give ; let religion, honour, valour, all be flung aside ; let Throne, Church, Ariston-cracy be cast into the fire, that we may be warmed at the blaze ; this is the selfishness of anarchy and atheism : between the two he trimmed, in the golden mean of a manly patriotism, a reasonable, unresisting, unhasting progress, and a stooping to the majesty of law. The Warburton theory of Government he rejected ; he recognised the duties and responsibilities of nations ; and thus his political system is traced back to its union with his Christianity in the responsible civil-religious Church-State. The laissez-faire school he opposed resolutely, looking with feelings of profound and melancholy interest upon the eighteenth century in its first half as a time of rest, which might have been improved, but was lost for ever.

In 1842, Arnold wrote thus in his diary :—"The day after to-morrow is my birth-day, if I am permitted to live to see it,—my forty-seventh birth-day since my birth. How large a portion of my life on earth is already passed ! And then,—what is to follow this life ? How visibly my outward work seems contracting and softening away into the gentler emotions of old age. In one sense, how nearly can I now say, 'Vixi.' And I thank God that, as far as ambition is concerned, it is, I trust, fully mortified ; I have no desire other than to step back from my present place in the world, and not to rise to a higher. Still, there are works which, with God's permission, I would do before the night cometh ; especially that great work, if I might be permitted to take part in it. But, above all, let me mind my own personal work, to keep myself pure, and zealous, and believing,—labouring to do God's will, yet not anxious that it should be done by me rather than by others, if God disapproves of my doing it."

Christianity has wrought its work ; the armour is girded on, yet there is the willingness to unbrace it ; the noble warrior valour yearns to share the combat, but yet is embraced and transfigured in the nobler, that hides self altogether in desire for the glory of God. Next morning he hears the

There is something martially stirring, and even beautiful, in the death of Arnold. It is like that of a warrior on the stricken field ; so suddenly does it come, and with such a calm pride does he meet it. That brief, decisive inquiry as to the nature of his ailment is strangely interesting ; he is racked with pain, and yet he is as pointed, cool, and explicit, as if he were examining a pupil. And the last look seen in his filming eye was that of unutterable kindness !

At the time when Arnold died, he could be ill spared to England. In the peaceful retirement towards which he had for some time looked, his eye might have taken a calmer and wider survey of those great questions with which his life had made him so thoroughly conversant, and on which the thought of a lifetime was well spent ; in the still and rich light of a restful evening, he might have seen what escaped his somewhat agitated gaze in the glare and bustle of day. Indications there were, as we have seen, of a change. It is not our part, however, to complain ; rather let us join in that noble expression of satisfied acquiescence in the plans of God, which so appropriately and sublimely closed his last writing.

THOMAS CHALMERS.

THOMAS CHALMERS was born in one of those homes which have been the pride and the blessing of Scotland ; to which, rather than to aught else, Scotland may point as her achievement among the nations, and to whose final uprearing countless influences and agencies have co-operated. It is often in the far distance that causes work, whose effects are seen in living bloom around ; the cloud was gathered from the remote Atlantic, whose drops cause the farmer's little corn-field to spring ; the hillock on whose side his cottage turns its bright face towards the southern sun was upheaved by the might of central fire ere mankind was born. The fierce struggle in the dark wood of Falkirk, the victorious charge on the bright plain of Bannockburn, the wrestling of Luther with Satan in his silent chamber at Erfurt, the far flight and inevitable gaze of the intellect of Calvin, the rugged earnestness of Knox, the godly valour of Peden and Cameron, all conjoined their agencies to build up the quiet homes of Presbyterian Scotland. Nor was this an unworthy or insignificant consummation : the almost reverential admiration with which men have looked into the circle of The Cottar's Saturday Night proclaims it to have been noble and sufficient. Of such homes, substantial comfort and cheerful piety were the characteristics ; religious thoughtfulness and industrious peace dwelt there in kindly union ; the “ auld Ha’-Bible ” was their corner-stone. Such homes write on the face of the world the best evidence of the truth of Christianity ! And the father of Thomas Chalmers was the worthy head of such a home, a fine example of the right-hearted Calvinistic Scotchman. Of deep and tender feelings, yet ever manly and firm, humble and reverent towards God, unobtrusive yet unbending in the presence of men, John Chalmers of Anstruther was that style of man which forms the life-blood of a nation, and whose presence in a family is the satisfactory guarantee of an education which may, without hesitation, be pronounced good. Thomas was his sixth child ; he was born at Anstruther, in Fife, in March 1780. He showed from the first a noble disposition : truthful, joyous, affectionate ; the reader can judge how the influences of such a father and such a home would act upon him.

In his childhood there occurred little worthy of remark ; little more, probably, than is to be told of all healthy and clever children. When so much a child as to be grossly ill treated by his nurse, he is yet so much a man as to observe with strict honour a promise of secrecy which she easily won from his unsuspecting heart. He soon determines to be a minister, and, not to lose time, chooses his first text, “ Let brotherly love continue,”—a text, by the way, of which he would have approved as heartily at sixty as at six. One day he is caught pacing his room, and repeating, in evident emotion, the words “ Oh, Absalom, my son, my son.” These are pleasing traits, if nowise extraordinary ; they at least show clearly that Thomas Chalmers was a noble child.

At school he was almost precisely what it is best for a boy to be ; if he erred at all, it was on the safe side. This portion of his training may be characterized fully and fitly by saying, that the important education of the class-room was carefully prevented from encroaching on the perhaps even more important education of the playground. He was distinguished in school by no remarkable proficiency, and might be known among his class-fellows only by the greater strength and buoyancy of his nature. When he chose to learn, he learned fast ; this is an undoubted and important fact. But it was in the field or the playground, where the free, loud laugh of the glad young bosom rang cheerily, every faculty awake to watch the turns and win the triumphs of the game, every muscle in fine healthful tension, every drop of blood surging in exultant fulness of life, that an observant and penetrating eye might have discerned the probability of his trimming skilfully between metaphysical dreaminess and mechanic dulness, and attaining a healthful, powerful manhood. He was at school rather a Clive than a Coleridge. His youthful mind was one of marked candour and purity ; at no period of his life was he tainted with aught definitely vicious or ignoble. His nature was open, generous, affectionate ; his strength, physical and intellectual, exuberant ; he was social, truthful, and pure-minded.

Ere completing his twelfth year, he entered the University of St Andrews. During the first two sessions, he was still a school-boy. "Golf, football, and particularly handball," with similar avocations, occupied his time. Anything deserving the name of classical culture he never received. At the precise period when a few additional years at school would probably have affected his whole history, he was sent to the university ; his sympathies, unawakened to the greatness and the beauty of antiquity, were soon arrested by mathematics.

It was in his fourteenth year that his mind awoke to its full intellectual vigour. At that period he commenced his third session at the university, and entered upon the study of mathematics. The pursuit was eminently congenial, and he at once became distinguished. The teacher of the mathematical classes in St Andrews at this time was Dr James Brown, and Chalmers was much in his society. It was the period of the French Revolution, and Dr Brown participated largely in the excitement of the time. He was of the school of radical reform in politics, and no doubt of extremely liberal sentiments on religious matters. As was to be expected, Chalmers embraced the opinions of his instructor. He read Godwin's Political Justice with delight and approval; he gazed on that vast, elaborate, and surely imposing structure, with its ice pinnacles clear, sharply defined, glittering in the wintry air, and deemed it a palace in whose many chambers the human race might at length find rest; he breathed for a time the thin atmosphere of its chill virtue and clockwork justice, and thought it were well always to be there. The ideas which he had brought from his father's house fell away from him; for the homespun but substantial garb of Scotch Calvinism, he substituted one of modern make, jaunty and of bright colour, but spun mainly of vapour and moonshine. The thorough depravity of man, an atonement by the death of Christ, salvation by faith alone, were left to the weak and narrow-minded. What seemed a wider and more brilliant prospect opened to the eye of the aspiring student. Scaling the sunny heights of college promotion, loving truth and proclaiming virtue, winning the crowns of fame, expatiating in the sky-fields of thought and imagination, basking in the smile of the Universal Benevolence, he would go on in his strength and prosper. This may be named the first epoch in the intellectual history of Chalmers.

In 1795, he entered the Divinity Hall, formally to commence the study of theology. His mind, however, was yet under the spell of geometry. He had forced his way to the French mathematical literature, and was diligently occupied in that field. Towards the close, however, of his first theological session, a more important intellectual influence than that of mathematics was brought to bear upon his mind. He became acquainted with the Inquiry of Jonathan Edwards. Its study was to him an exercise of rapturous delight ; his mind was filled with it till it seemed about to "lose its balance." It was the second determining influence in his mental development ; mathematics and radicalism were the first. One or two observations on the nature of this influence, and on what it reveals, seem here necessary.

The mere fact that, at the age of fifteen, it was to Chalmers not a task, but a positive and intense pleasure, to follow the dry light of the great American metaphysician into those remote and difficult regions of thought in which it expatiated, is a proof of extraordinary intellectual endowment. At an age when his sympathies might have been expected to find comfort and response in the circulating library, and his intellect a pleasurable occupation in the lighter walks of history or science, he found his whole spiritual nature freely and delightfully exercised by the treatise on the freedom of the will. And the effect it produced on his boyish mind is remarkable. With the exception of Swift's iron misanthropy, there is perhaps no phenomenon in literature comparable to the unimpassioned coldness of the mind of Edwards in the investigation of those high and awful themes which are directly or indirectly the subject of his Inquiry. His argument, when well understood in its limits and conditions, is, I think, irrefragable ; yet it is more than can be demanded of the human mind to disrobe itself so entirely of human sympathy, as the mind of Jonathan Edwards is seen to disrobe itself as we read that treatise. Edwards was certainly not devoid of kindness of heart, but, in composing his work on the freedom of the will, he appears to have resolved himself absolutely into a thinking apparatus. He deliberately looks into hell, and the whole heat of its burnings cannot melt into a tear the ice in his eye ; he gazes on a great portion of his brother men stretched to eternity upon a wheel, and his eyelid quivers no more than if he saw a butterfly.

The circumstance with which we are at present concerned is that, despite the tremendous impression produced on the mind of Chalmers by the Inquiry into the freedom of the will, its effect was not to darken but to brighten, not to depress but to elevate. It produced "a twelvemonth of elysium ;" these are his own words. His intellect was not beaten hard, and rendered dead to all other impulses,—a common case with young men whom the genius of some writer overpowers. He did not, with a trembling, gloomy, irresistible curiosity, pry and pry into the world of mystery here opened up to him, as young Foster would have done. He accepted the truth he found ; he saw the whole universe in God. But when he went with Edwards to the mouth of hell, he still heard the melodies of heaven. He saw that Infinite Power clasped the world, but he could feel that Infinite Wisdom guided the infinite might, and be content. His mind expanded and brightened. He might have been seen at early morn in the dewy fields, whither he went to wander alone, and to expatiate in the vast conception ; to feel the world but a little station on which to stand and see himself overarched by the infinitude of God as by the illimitable azure above his head ; to lift up his eyes and catch a glimpse of the golden chains by which the universe hangs from the throne of God. Looking upon him in those hours, one is reminded of that striking passage in modern poetry, in which the great poet of nature and meditation, whose conception of certain great influences which aid in moulding lofty and thoughtful character was perhaps stronger than that of any other, has pictured the corresponding stage of mental history in the case of his own hero.

What soul was his, when, from the naked top

 Rise up and bathe the world in light ! He look'd—
 Ocean and earth, the solid frame of earth,
 And ocean's liquid mass, in gladness lay
 Beneath him :—Far and wide the clouds were touch'd,
 And in their silent faces could he read Unutterable love. Sound needed none,
 Nor any voice of joy ; his spirit drank
 The spectacle : sensation, soul, and form,
 All melted into him ; they swallow'd up
 His animal being ; in them did he live,
 And by them did he live ; they were his life.
 In such access of mind, in such high hour
 Of visitation from the living God,
 Thought was not ; in enjoyment it expired.
 No thanks he breathed, he proffer'd no request ;
 Rapt into still communion that transcends
 The imperfect offices of prayer and praise,
 His mind was a thanksgiving to the Power
 That made him ; it was blessedness and love."

Chalmers was not at all smitten by fear ; the passionless demonstration of Edwards, of all modes of representation perhaps the best calculated to impress his mind with terror, cast over it no abiding gloom ; he experienced the sublime emotion of reverential awe, but he knew nothing of slavish fear. His mind was of that radically sound and noble order which responds to influences of hope and love rather than of fear and constraint ; he had an affinity with light.

He had not yet, however, completed the stages of what was strictly his education. He had to pass through a more painful ordeal than he had hitherto known. In 1798, he entered the family of a gentleman as private tutor. Nothing of moment occurred during his residence there. It was, indeed, a fine reply which he gave when taunted by his employer with pride, one worthy of a self-respecting and high-minded youth : "There are," he said, "two kinds of pride, Sir ; there is that pride which lords it over inferiors, and there is that pride which rejoices in repressing the insolence of superiors. The first I have none of ; the second I glory in : " yet slight importance is to be attached to the probably accidental squabbles in which he became involved. But about the period of his quitting this residence and returning to St Andrews to complete his theological studies, when he was just entering on his twentieth year, he fell in with D'Holbach's once celebrated Système de la Nature. The agitations of his tutorship had, it may be, somewhat unsettled and fevered his mind, rendering it more open to assault, disturbing that calm concentration of power by which error is best met and repelled. The pompous, far-sounding rhetoric of the book charmed his ear; the magnitude and apparent stability of its scientific scaffolding caught his eye; its tone of calm assumption, as if it were the conclusive utterance of ultimate truth, perplexed and confounded him. It preached virtue of the most high-flown order. It could not be the birth of ignorance, for it was reared upon the foundation of modern science. It planted its scientific engines on the earth, and with an air of perfect strength and philosophic deliberation turned them against principalities and powers. First, it swept from earth's horizon all religions, the Christian among the rest; these it flung into one grave, and wrote over it,—Superstition. Then it cast a thick impenetrable smoke, as from the depths of hell, over all the heaven, blotting out those fields of immortality towards which the eye of humanity, through its weary pilgrimage, has evergazed with wistful hope; these it called the phantom pictures of enthusiasm and imagination. Last of all, it aimed its bolts at the throne of the universe, to dethrone Him that sat there. The ultimate achievement of science was to seat itself in the throne of God. And how beneficent was its reign to be! The green earth was to bask in universal sunshine, impeded by no darkening cloud; the fair field was no longer to be trodden by the hoof of the war-steed, the harvests of earth were no longer to be fatted with human gore; the world was to become one vast dancing saloon, where men abode for a time, and from which, on any occasion of inconvenience, suicide, the noble right and privilege of the free, was ready to dismiss them ; all Ethiopians were to be washed white, or at least white-washed ; the infancy and boyhood of humanity had passed, and now the noonday of its years had come. These things were to be done by the knowledge of the laws of the world ; such laws were all physical ; ideas could be mechanically accounted for ; “our soul has occasion for ideas the same as our stomach has occasion for aliments.” The proud philosopher required but one word to account for the universe,—physical law. Such was the teaching of the Système de la Nature.

The mind of Chalmers was of a decidedly scientific cast ; he had been long accustomed to the bare and precise reasoning of mathematics ; he delighted in a definite, comprehensible, tangible proof. Here, then, was D'Holbach, pointing out his laws, measuring, with consummate assurance, heaven and earth, plausibly, nay, powerfully, exhibiting the evils of superstition, and making them synonymous with the evils of religion, talking in the loftiest strain of universal benevolence and felicity, and concluding with a fine rhetorical panegyric on virtue. To the baron it was sun-clear that a divine power in the universe was superfluous ; these were the laws, why go beyond them ? And if divine power was superfluous, it was but the next step to pronounce belief in it noxious. Chalmers was staggered. It seemed, for a time, as if that Eye which Edwards had shown him lighting the universe was to go out. He was in deep anguish and perplexity ; his friends feared for his reason. But his mind was too fair, too noble, and too substantially grounded, to lapse into scepticism. He had heard one side of the question ; he honestly turned to hear the other. The result was, that he was firmly and for ever established in the belief of Christianity.

The various steps in this gradual consummation I am unable to trace ; but the outline of the process may be discerned. He candidly studied the great apologists of last century—Beattie, Paley, and Butler. The first of these it was who steadied him after the maddening draught of materialism : his final declaration, uttered long afterwards, was, “ Butler made me a Christian.” He soon saw that, with all its pretence and paraphernalia, the system of D’Holbach was a mere film on the surface of things ; the arguments of Beattie certified him of the reliability of man’s inner beliefs ; and Butler’s giant intellect gave him a glance into the real structure of the universe. He came to the unalterable conviction that there is a God. He then looked calmly at the historical evidence for the fact, that Jesus of Nazareth did perform works competent only to almighty power on the plains of Judea ; the clear and masterly logic of Paley satisfied him that it was so. The other steps naturally followed. The result was a deliberate conviction that it is a fact dubitable by no fair and capable intellect, that the Christian religion was positively revealed to man by the living God.

Two remarks here suggest themselves.

The first is, That this method of proof embraces substantial evidence for the truth of Christianity. There are minds which are incapable of doubting the existence of God : born with an ingrained conviction that man was created for an end, that the universe is not a mad flickering phantasmagoria, devoid of purpose, and meaning blank nothing, they are unable to compass the conception of the non-existence of the Supreme Mind. This form of intellect is doubtless the most substantial and healthful of all. And it is likely that the mind of Chalmers was radically of this type ; the temporary delirium produced by D’Holbach would probably have departed even without positive opposing argument, when his mind regained the power of calm thought. But, if this central fact is doubted, it must, first of all, be placed on an impregnable basis : and how can it be so, save by exhibiting the reasonableness of an acceptance of the ineradicable beliefs of humanity, of a trust in “the mighty hopes which make us men ?” It being placed beyond doubt that God exists, and that the world has been established by Him, the next thing is to advance to a more precise idea of His general government and of our relation to Him, an end to be attained by earnest contemplation of that small portion of His ways which we do know,—in other words, by a consideration of the analogies of Butler. The ground thus cleared,—the need and the reasonableness of Christianity demonstrated,—the time will have come to consider the actual historical evidence for its truth ; and the clear, impartial, comprehensive summary by Paley of the testimony to the fact that Christ raised Lazarus, and rose Himself, from the grave, will always continue a satisfactory embodiment of the essentials of this evidence. If the inquirer now believes that the mission of Jesus was Divine, that his “living Father” sent Him, the whole system of revelation of which He is the corner-stone will be seen to stand on an impregnable basis ; all that was delivered before the Christian era resting on His authority ; all that has been delivered since secured by His promise. In the individual case, there may be a mode of arriving at the conviction of the Divine truth of the Scriptures different from that here sketched. These Scriptures may be so applied to the soul by the Holy Spirit that their Divine origin cannot be doubted. It is equally true that the profound accordance with the general order of things here on earth exhibited by these writings, the answers they embody to man’s questionings, the supply they offer to man’s wants, may be so explored and comprehended that the result must be an assurance that the whole phenomenon is utterly beyond explanation, save on the hypothesis that the ordinary dealings of Providence were in one case diverged from, and the natural powers of man in one instance divinely supplemented. But when the question is a simple question of fact ; when a man desires not, in the first instance, to enter the edifice of Christianity, but to learn whether the pillars of it were laid by God, in the same positive, independent, objective way in which He created the world, the plain logical vindication of the historical fact, that a superhuman power accompanied the words of Jesus, is a legitimate form of Christian evidence.

For it must be distinctly avowed on the one hand, and kept in view on the other, that the province of the Christian apologist is limited. There is one sphere which he can never enter, the sphere of the operations of the Divine Spirit. He may show the consistence of Christianity, viewed as an external fact, with the laws of evidence ; but he cannot open the eyes of "the world" to see that Spirit whom the Saviour declared its inability to see ; he cannot enable the natural man to discern the things which are "spiritually discerned." Were the work of Christian apology complete, it could by possibility have achieved but two things : the proof of Christianity as a religion once supernaturally given, and the proof of Christianity as a religion in all ages divinely characterized. The work still remaining to be done in Christian apologetics falls mainly under the second of these heads. That work Paley and his school did not certainly, save perhaps in a scarce perceptible degree, attempt ; but they did attempt, and with a success which can hardly be called in question, the former portion of Christian apologetics. They answered the question which men will naturally and fairly in the first instance put to the Christian—How do you know that your Master spoke in Judea, and spoke with supernatural authority ? And a satisfactory answer to this enquiry must always embrace a proof of Christianity sufficient to content the sober mind, and to condemn the gainsayer.

The second remark is but a particular application of the first. It is, that in the present day there exists a disposition unduly to depreciate the apologists of last century. Against Paley in particular a very strong prejudice has begun to gain ground—a prejudice of perhaps slight importance in itself, and not absolutely without foundation in reference to Paley individually—but of decidedly injurious tendency in throwing discredit on the substantial service rendered by him to the Christian cause. His character it is not difficult to define. It was not of the noblest type; but it was still further removed from one radically ignoble. His mind was antithetically opposed to all that holds of poetry; emotional energy of every sort was alien to his mental atmosphere; his temperament was a uniform mean, an untroubled calm, removed at once from the glory and the gloom of storm. His intellect bore such relation to a mind like Paul's as a creed bears to a Prophecy of Isaiah—as the cold steel of a Roman legionary to the flaming sword of an angel. Joy to the measure of rapture, sorrow to the measure of despair, he could not feel; the devotion of the martyr and the raving of the fanatic were alike removed from the balanced moderation of his mood; the mighty passions which surge in the revolution or crash on the battle-field found no answering sympathy in his breast. And Foster declared truly that this “order of mind is ill fitted to embody the highest grandeur of the Christian character—that the natural incapability of great emotions operates very strongly to prevent the prevalence of the Christian spirit.” Yet it is just as plain, on the other hand, that Paley was radically an honest, able, worthy man. Of rough Yorkshire kindred, and humorous homely ways, he was precisely of the stuff from which nature makes the substantial, deliberate, steady, sagacious Englishman; there was a certain sarcastic, though kindly ruggedness and plainness in his speech, pointedly opposed to insincerity or meanness ; a warm homely man, whom those who knew him loved ; one totally devoid of affectation and pretence, with little ambition, and no greed. And his intellectual light, if very dry, was powerful ; the error was subtle it could not pierce, the truth was sure which stood its scrutiny. To discern with conclusive certainty the vital points of a question ; to draw them out in clear logical sequence ; and to estimate their real and available value, few minds have been better able than Paley's. His style wants poetic adornment and emotional fire ; yet it has a certain conclusive satisfying tone, and its perfect clearness lends it no mean charm ; it makes you feel that it is not all base metal which does not glitter. Paley's mind, though wanting certain affinities with minds of the highest order which Johnson's possessed, was essentially more substantial and powerful than that which produced Rasselas. If you look well, moreover, you will find the moral system of each nearly similar ; the high and serene region of Christian holiness, as distinguished from prudential virtue, neither can be said to have entered. I shall not object to Johnson's being entitled a hero ; but if his theory of virtue resolved itself radically into prudence, as Mr Carlyle grants, I shall at least consider Mr Kingsley in an untenable and absurd position, when he represents Paley's character as an unanswerable argument against his reasonings. But, indeed, the absurdity into which Mr Kingsley, in the person of his hero Alton Locke, has suffered himself to fall, is complicated and glaring. To effect that confutation which the precise nature of the infidelity of last century required, an intellect such as Paley's was positively demanded. The faintest gleam of enthusiasm, the slightest warmth of passion, would have neutralized its effect. It was the cool, "philosophic," enlightened intellect which found Christianity unsatisfactory ; it was the cold sharp edge of the scalpel of modern science which was declared to have exposed its unsoundness ; unstable and excited minds, natures enthusiastic and fanciful, might be allured by the imposing fable ; but if you divested yourself of all prejudice and all passion, and turned on the Bible the same clear impartial judgment which you brought to the study of Euclid, it was not a matter of doubt that rejection of every notion of its inspiration would result. To meet such opponents, to dissipate such ideas, Paley was the very man. “Not so fast,” he said, “I’m Yorkshire too : look at this phenomenon just as you look at any other in nature or history ; look at it on all sides, with piercing scrutiny, but with fairness and without haste ; and then, whether convinced or not, declare honestly if it does not at least require a tremendous effort to consider it the fruit of imposture or frenzy ?” Since the days of Paley, infidelity has changed its tone ; the old jargon about priestcraft, imposture, and fanaticism, has well-nigh died away ; there is a caution now in assailing fairly and in front the facts of Christianity : and for this change there can be no doubt we are largely indebted to him. Mr Kingsley is a man of rich emotions and unquestioned earnestness ; but his intellectual force is puny to that of Paley ; and it is not with the best grace that a clergyman of the Church of England puts into the mouth of a sceptic a vague and irrelevant charge against the character of him who wrote the Horæ Paulinæ. The temperament of John Foster differed as essentially from that of Paley as Mr Kingsley’s, yet his verdict on Paley’s achievement as a defender of Christianity was as follows :—“It has been the enviable lot of here and there a favoured individual to do some one important thing so well that it shall never need to be done again : and we regard Dr Paley’s writings on the Evidences of Christianity as of so signally decisive a character, that we should be content to let them stand as the essence and the close of the great argument on the part of its believers ; and should feel no despondency or chagrin if we could be prophetically certified that such an efficient Christian reasoner would never henceforward arise. We should consider the grand fortress of proof, as now raised and finished, the intellectual capital of that empire which is destined to leave the widest boundaries attained by the Roman far behind." This may require qualification and circumscription, but it is a very important testimony, and will ultimately be found to be substantially correct.

We have seen that Chalmers passed through an ordeal of doubt ; and such doubt as was peculiarly ensnaring to his mathematical intellect and strong scientific tastes. That Harmattan wind, in which, it is said, no soul of man can now live, had passed over him, with its doleful music and its burning sand ; but he came through unscathed ; on the homeward side of the desert his joints were not loosed, his nerves were not unstrung, his frame had been too firmly knit to be relaxed, he sprang forward as if he had never drooped. And on any theory of character, this is the grand proof of the vital force and natural vigour of a man. Doubt is the foe by vanquishing which the young knight of truth wins his spurs. Doubt is the lion guarding the palace of truth, which must be looked at, and dared, and controlled by the dauntless eye, but in passing beyond which alone are to be won the conquests of manhood. It had no power to petrify or paralyze Chalmers ; he inherited the instinctive knowledge that between the true, however difficult its proofs may be to exhibit, and the plausible, however difficult its disguise may be to pierce, the distance and difference are simply infinite. It was a moral impossibility for him to have been a sceptic ; he would have forced his way to conscientious and hearty action, or sunk into madness or the grave ; doubt was to him agony ; he felt it to be the negation of all work, the death of action, if it was not its birth ; and he struggled towards

For the functions of the high calling to which he aspired, he felt no enthusiastic predilection. His thirst for knowledge was by no means satisfied, and the decided bent of his ambition was still towards academic preferment. Instead of seeking work in his profession, he proceeded to Edinburgh, and studied at the University there during two sessions. Metaphysical and mathematical subjects chiefly occupied his attention ; but his reading was doubtless wide and varied. It is generally said that he was a man of meagre knowledge, that he could lay no claim to erudition. There is truth in the assertion ; but it is apt to render us oblivious to another truth of no slight importance, by which it is to be qualified and supplemented. What is generally and technically understood by learning, Chalmers did not possess. But with the great questions of his day, and the general questions which at all times naturally agitate the human mind, he was abundantly acquainted ; and the impetuous force of his own genius was sufficient to overpower and render invisible even what knowledge of books he did possess. His native strength refused to be trammelled by the thoughts of other men ; he so completely fused in the fire of his own intellect what he obtained from others, every ingot was so perfectly melted, that it became impossible to recognise it in that molten torrent. And of the pedantry of learning he was perfectly, felicitously free. If he found good wheat lying before him, he deemed it to the full as valuable and fit for use as if it had lain three thousand years in the case of a mummy ; if common sense and plain evidence set their stamp on a fact or argument, he did not care to affix to it the seal of antiquity. We saw him deeply influenced by the literature and ideas of the French Revolution ; we found him rejoicing in the sublime abstrac-

tions of Edwards ; we found him plunged in the surges of doubt by D'Holbach, and rescued by the strong arms of the great apologists of his own or the preceding age. And now, for two years, during which he engaged very sparingly in ministerial work, he led the life of a student ; a life which, in his case, could not be idle. We must not forget, besides, that he had mastered French, and carried his studies into the rich mathematical literature of that language ; his scientific acquirements, lastly, were becoming more and more extensive and profound. If not learned, he was certainly a man of great information.

We must now pass lightly over what is yet one of the most interesting and characteristic portions of the history of Chalmers,—that, namely, which embraces the first few years of his incumbency in Kilmany, and during which, amid scorn and conflict, he taught mathematics and chemistry in St Andrews.

In that period, with all its eccentricity, and with even a certain degree of displeasing extravagance, there is much to admire. So great and healthful is the young strength, that it must attract the sympathies of the healthful and strong. A surging, insatiable energy characterizes Chalmers during the time. It seems a pleasure to him to find hills in his way, for the mere opportunity of grasping and hurling them aside ; his toil and his enjoyment rise together ; he is a perfervid Scot, a lion rampant : mathematical studies, chemical studies, considerable metaphysical studies, parochial duties, university struggles, book-making on an important scale, and much more, are insufficient to damp his first youthful ardour. His intellectual powers, too, have not been outrun by his energy ; he has given unquestionable proofs of a rare order of talent,—the speedy and joyous subjugation of every new science which came in his way, the suggestion of a theory for the reconciliation of Scripture and geology, the acquisition of a clear, glowing, and finely balanced style. There is sufficient proof, also, that he has already conceived, in outline, an entire scheme of Christian evidence. Lastly, and of all most decisive, he has begun to make his influence distinctly felt among the men who come within his sphere ; Chalmers of Kilmany has become one to whom eyes are turned, and concerning whom expectations are formed ; the invisible crown set by nature on his brow is slowly waxing visible. And, whatever may be doubted, it is certain that his moral qualities are of the kingly order. Courage, tenderness, enthusiastic loyalty, an ever open hand, wakeful and ardent sympathy with all that is high, and pure, and healthful ; these, and similar traits of nobleness, cannot fail to evince that here is another of those whom, from the ancient time, nature has intended for trust, honour, and love.

But it must be conceded that, in an estimate of the character and powers of Chalmers during this youthful period, no express reference is necessary to Christianity : Chalmers, in fact, was then a Christian pastor in a sense and manner which is now becoming obsolete. The last century produced in Scotland a form or semblance of Christianity which will probably never re-appear. It was the result of the general decay of earnestness over the land, and the sickly flowering of a sentimental and wordy philosophic morality. From the religion of the Puritan and Covenanter there had been a recoil ; to be virtuous was good and fair ; honour and truth were to be commended ; sublime benevolence was to be preached ; but to defy earth and hell for your belief, to worship God under the mist of the mountain corrie, to mount the scaffold rather than throw a sand-grain in the eye of conscience, were the follies of bigotry and excitement, produced endless commotion, and even endangered the interests of general morality and respectable society. The grand distinctive doctrines of Christianity were, probably, in some sense true ; to deny them altogether would stultify the Bible ; but they were to be quietly considered incomprehensible, and, as strictly esoteric mysteries, to be excluded from public ministrations. Who is not familiar with the watchwords of the honey-mouthed school which came then to occupy the pulpits of the Church of Knox ? Virtue its own reward, white-robed innocence descending from heaven (in no great haste), decorum and decency prim of visage and trim of garb, the enlightenment of the age, the happiness of the greatest number, flowed blandly forth as the preaching of Christianity. The art of the preacher was softly to mouth truism, skilfully to gild commonplace. That school produced Blair. It is interesting to observe what it made of Paul. Readers may have seen one or two sermons by a noted Moderate preacher in which the attempt is made to depict him as a Christian orator. The fiery and urgent man, whose words flame and burn on the page, who startled the philosophic serenity of the sages of Athens, and uttered his grand song of triumph in the scowl of Nero, who could not open his lips without speaking of Jesus Christ and Him crucified, who abandoned, in express terms, as different in idea from Christianity, the wisdom of Greece and the morality of law, was represented standing, in polite and graceful attitude, and lecturing Felix, for more than half an hour, on virtue, mercy, justice, and respectability in general, cautiously avoiding the "mysteries" of the Christian religion, and recommending it to his weak hearer in a soft and harmless garb borrowed from Seneca. The effect over the country was simple and decisive. The heart of the Scottish people turned from the modern school : the popular instinct named it—Moderate.

It may be thought strange that such a man as Chalmers could ever have been a follower of a school like this. Yet it is a fact admitting of no question. Christianity had never fairly laid its grasp on his heart ; he had never profoundly considered whether it was the real living Christianity he held or no. He offers a striking example of the not unusual phenomenon of a man whose natural force and nobleness will remain unparalyzed by any influence of school or creed. But it may be that this easy-suiting garment called Christianity is not really adapted to display the Herculean mould of his limbs ; it may be in the garb of the warrior, in the old mail of the martyr, that we can best discern the strength and majesty of his frame ! Let us proceed.

At about the age of thirty Chalmers engaged to write the article Christianity for the Edinburgh Encyclopædia. In the midst of the study and composition connected with this article, he was attacked by a severe illness, which confined him for a period of four months. It was an era in his history ; the most important era of all. It was from it that he dated the central fact of his life—his conversion.

Death had, of late, more than once passed by Chalmers, casting on him the pale glare of his eye ; one after another of his brothers and sisters had been carried to the grave. At length the impartial foot seemed to be drawing near to his own threshold ; he felt no coward fear, but, with an earnest calmness which he had not hitherto known, he began to think. Fear was no important agent in the mental revolution which ensued ; the state of mind indicated by Bunyan's Slough of Despond, he expressly says, he never experienced. His nature was of the nobler sort, which is drawn by a glimpse of heaven, and that a heaven of holiness, rather than startled by an unveiling of hell. He could not but discern that there had been something in the breasts of the early Christians which was not in his. Eternity, in its unmeasured vastness, enwrapped his mind ; time, seen against its burning radiance, seemed dream-like and filmy. The virtue of philosophy, he began profoundly to suspect, was not the holiness of God. The power of this virtue, too, to do much towards the regeneration of the world, became questionable. His old friend Godwin, in discoursing of justice, had spoken thus :—"A comprehensive maxim which has been laid down upon the subject is, 'that we should love our neighbour as ourselves.' But this maxim, though possessing considerable merit as a popular principle, is not modelled with the strictness of philosophical accuracy." Chalmers hardly found this maxim, defective as it might be, conformed to in the parish of Kilmany. His appeals on the subject had been received with imperturbable calmness. He had witnessed no effect whatever from lectures, however impassioned, on virtue and benevolence. In his own heart, and in his sphere of work, something seemed essentially wrong. And so there commenced a work in the privacy of his closet, which may, without any figure, be said to have resulted in the kindling of a new vital energy in the centre of his being. Its progress was gradual, but every step was taken irrevocably ; its conclusion found Chalmers transformed from a historic into a vital Christian, from a philosophic into a Christian pastor. Christ had become to him all in all. I shall not intrude upon the privacy of his closet while the great change is taking place. I shall not attempt to trace the fading of old things into oblivion and death, and their gradual resurrection as all things become new in Christianity. I shall not venture to watch his soul in its pleadings with God, until, at last, that wonderful passage bears personal reference to Chalmers, "the kingdom of God is within you." But there is interest in noting the appearance of weakness which presents itself as we look into that closet. It recalls the "hysterical tears of a soldier like Cromwell;" the "delusion," whose strength "scarcely any madhouse could equal," of Bunyan ; there is not, certainly, such intensity of feeling, but the sense of a divine presence and agency is the same. We hear him earnestly pleading for pardon, though his life has been highly virtuous ; he calls himself a sinner, though always respectable ; he trembles, although surely God is good. His soul is prostrate. What can we hope for from the like of this ? What advantage has it over the most "melancholy whimpering" of fanaticism, of which Chalmers could once speak ? May we not apprehend a total relaxation of energy, a total shrivelling of intellect ? Time will answer the questions. Meanwhile one point of considerable moment may be remarked. It is before the Infinite God he stoops ! It may be deemed possible that conscious alliance with the Infinite will not make him weak among the finite ; possibly, when he once feels that the eye of God is actually fixed on him, the light of all other eyes, whether in wrath or in applause, may grow dim in proportion ; perhaps, when he lays down the philosophic armour in which he has trusted, he may go forth in the strength of weakness, mightier than before. "'Tis conscience that makes cowards of us all, but oh ! it is conscience, too, which makes heroes of us all."*

Times are changed in the manse and parish of Kilmany. The minister is changed, and many changes follow. One by one the worldly aspirations that have fired the breast of Chalmers fade away ; reluctantly, but resolutely, the eye is averted from university honours ; reluctantly, but irreversibly, the determination is taken, and the mathematical volume closed. One great idea embraces his soul like an atmosphere, the glory of God ; one great work lies before him, to manifest that glory in the good of man. His soul now gushes forth at all seasons in prayer : his aim with himself is no longer to preserve an unblemished walk before men, and to have the testimony of his heart that he possesses the manly virtue of the schools ; his aim is the inward heaven of Christianity, the mental atmosphere that angels breathe, unsullied purity of thought and emotion in that inmost dwelling where hypocrisy cannot come. His aim with his people is no longer merely to repress dishonesty, to promote sobriety, to produce respectability in general ; it is to turn them to righteousness, that they may be his joy and rejoicing in the day of the Lord ; it is to array them in that robe, purer than seraphs' clothing, in which not even the eye of God can find a stain ; it is to lead them with him as a people into the light of God's countenance.

His parishioners, meanwhile, are astonished. They see by "the glory in his eye" that some strange new light has dawned upon him. They sat listless while he descanted on the beauty of virtue, but they cannot sit unmoved while his heart glows within him, and his face seems suffused with a transfiguring radiance, as he unveils the beauty of holiness, and turns their eyes to the wonders of Infinite Love streaming through Jesus down upon the world. Nor can their apathy maintain itself when he carries his ministrations into the domestic circle, and with burning earnestness presses home individually the offers and the appeals of the gospel. The parish of Kilmany glows with returning Christianity, like the fields of opening summer. For it is no partial change that has come over Chalmers. Partial characteristics were never his ; halfness went against the grain of his nature ; he had held all his beliefs firmly. And now, in the manhood of his powers, when the feeling was beginning slowly to permeate Scotland that a man of master intellect had arisen in the land, after he had long and diligently walked in the path of this world, he was arrested as by a blaze of light from heaven, smitten awhile to the ground, and then raised up a new man, a Christian. He had formerly known the God of the fatalist, and had bowed, in a certain ecstatic awe, before Him ; now he knew the God of the Christian, and believed him to be Love. He had never worshipped sinful self ; now even righteous self was crucified. It was a great day for Scotland when Chalmers, in the might of his opening manhood, became vitally Christian.

It was about this time, in August 1812, that he married Miss Grace Pratt. Of his domestic concerns it is unnecessary to say more than that his home was one of deep and tranquil comfort ; in all embarrassment, toil, and opposition, a sanctuary of inviolable repose.

But his fame has been extending ; the news that some mysterious change has passed over the minister of Kilmany has thrilled electrically over Scotland. Such oratory has not been heard in these parts in the memory of man. It speedily becomes known that one of the greatest preachers in the Church of Scotland ministers weekly in a sequestered valley near the estuary of the Tay. A feeling of deep gladness begins to pervade the Evangelical party, as the new leader steps forward to take the command. And hark ! from the respectable, soft-going, moderately-religious ministers, what voice is that ? “As for Chalmers, he is mad !” What a piece of testimony is here ! How decisive, how comforting ! “Paul, thou art beside thyself.”

This fortuitous sneer about madness is not void of suggestive meaning. Look at the great workers and warriors, the great thinkers and governors, all who have been of the kings of the earth : does not their power, in one universal aspect of it, admit of definition thus,—A force as of madness in the hand of reason ? In our age, we find two men who pointedly suggest this combination ; Thomas Chalmers, and, in certain respects still more forcibly, but in others far less, Thomas Carlyle.

The sequestered Fifeshire valley cannot retain Scotland's greatest preacher. The Tron Church in Glasgow becomes vacant ; and after a sharp contest, in which he is pitted against Principal Macfarlane, Chalmers is appointed its minister. Calmly balancing arguments, he concludes that the hand of God is in the arrangement, and that it is his duty to go ; but he is well aware that he leaves tranquillity for turmoil, the trust and tenderness of personal friendship for the din and vacancy of public station and applause ; he bids adieu to his quiet valley and its one hundred and fifty families with deep and honest sadness. “ Oh ! ” he said, long afterwards, “ there was more tearing of the heart-strings at leaving the valley of Kilmany, than at leaving all my great parish of Glasgow.”

It was some time after quitting Kilmany that Chalmers, in an address to his former parishioners, bore that emphatic and weighty testimony to the power of evangelical Christianity as a moral agency, which has been so often quoted and referred to. He distinctly declared that his preaching of mere virtue had been absolutely powerless ; but that the proclamation of God’s love in Christ Jesus was at once mighty. His words furnish an additional and important attestation, that the simple truths of the gospel of Jesus are gifted with a power to lay hold upon and impress healthy and unsophisticated intellects, which belongs to no moral or philosophical dogmas. In Chalmers, Christianity was seen in its ancient freshness, beauty, and power ; and in our century he found its might to purify the hearts and lives of men, to breathe moral health over a people, to radiate light around, as prevailing as when the star led the way to Bethlehem. He was, and any man like him will be, a centre of beneficent influence. Such talents as his must ever continue rare ; but what were the effect to be looked for from a pastorate whose members all resembled him in the single but paramount circumstance of godliness ! Imagine the land sown with pastors kindled, as by Divine fire, with that ambition which God, in a promise unspeakably glorious, has appointed for them : — “ They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever.” It lies within the discernible and traceable power of a truly Christian ministry to shed over our land a brightness as of the resurrection morning. The nation would live anew ; the golden day would break ; the baleful forms and influences of crime would be smitten ; and infidels, as they saw the serpents which now cast their deadly coils round the limbs of the nation, writhing, with dazed eyes and relaxing hold, in the overpowering light, would be astonished and silenced.

From the time of his settlement in the west may be dated the commencement of that intellectual kingship which Chalmers can be said to have long exercised over the great body of the Scottish nation. He now steps forth into that arena where are the severest tests of greatness. He becomes the cynosure of a city and people ; he reads applause in every eye ; he hears it from every tongue. Now is the time to know what he really is. Does Chalmers in elevation seem in his natural station and atmosphere ? Does he, amid noise and pretence, lose the power of distinguishing and prizing real work ? Can he gauge and measure fame, and put it to its uses like any other dispensation of God ? Can he distinguish between adulation streaming in from all the winds, and which, in all its varieties, is either mere vacant sound or selfishness set to music, from the still but immortal voice of friendship ? Does he give indications of an unsettled, weakly enthusiastic, or fanatical mind ? Are his air and attitude those of one who has drugged his intellect with an "opiate delusion," and rushes wildly and vaguely on, with haste for energy, and vociferous dogmatism for thought ? These are fair and important questions ; the answers will gradually unfold themselves.

No sooner do we find him fairly in the midst of the tumult and glare of his Glasgow popularity,—no sooner do we perceive his words swaying the minds of thousands, his house the centre of admiring throngs, his fame a theme and topic in the city,—than we are arrested by an instance of retired and tender affection. There is a member of his congregation, aged twenty. The delicacy and beauty of the young man's thoughts, the purity of his aspirations, the general nobleness of his nature, draw towards him the heart of Chalmers. There springs up between them a close, confiding, boy-like friendship ; tender and impassioned as any friendship of romance, yet cemented by the holier sympathy of Christian love. Their "loves in higher love endure ;" to endure for ever. It was a fair spectacle in our hard-working century, where ideals are so few ;—Chalmers, the most renowned preacher, perhaps in the world, certainly in Scotland, walking by the side of his youthful parishioner, and pouring out his heart in the endearments of a soft, almost womanly affection. If you would thoroughly know the man, look long upon that spectacle. The trumpeting of fame brings no comfort to him ; he permits it to die away in the distance ; but now he finds one heart where pure love dwells, he knows that this at least is real, he folds his friend to his breast in an ecstasy of fondness, he walks by his side under the blue sky, listening to his voice, in deep serene delight, as to a strain of spiritual music. Or look into his closet, and see the friends on their knees before God, the fiery Chalmers and the mild Thomas Smith, to whom his heart is soft as a fountain. Smith gradually faded away in a consumption ; often, with tearful eye, did his pastor bend over his bed, or kneel by its side ; and when, at last, he lay in death's pallor, the strong, manly face of Chalmers was bathed in uncontrollable tears. From of old it has been known, that valour and tenderness form the noblest and most beautiful union ; the lion heart and strength, guided by maiden gentleness ; perhaps all the true and brave are tender. The simple story of his friendship for Thomas Smith brings us into closer knowledge, and, as it were, contact with the heart and nature of Chalmers, than would the mere record of his fame, if echoed through centuries.

It was in the close of the year 1815 that his renown in Glasgow culminated. He then delivered his famed Astronomical Discourses. They were preached on week-days, yet the audience crowded the church. There was a reading-room opposite the edifice; during the time of delivery it stood vacant; the merchant and the politician pouring out, to hang breathless on the lips of Chalmers. His style was now fully formed, and was, in many respects, extraordinary; perfectly dissimilar from any other English style; unallied in diction and cadence to any foreign language, it was the native growth of his mind, an original birth of genius. And whatever minor or particular exceptions may be taken to that style, I cannot regard it as a matter open to dispute, that it has elements of marvellous power and grandeur. Massive and gorgeous, expressive, often graphic, yet with a certain billowy regularity of sentence and rolling cadence of rhythm, it was in the hand of its own magician a really mighty weapon. Exuberant to what in written composition seems diffuseness, it might, if used by a weakling, sound like bombast; but its exuberance is that of tropic woods, and ocean waves, and rainbowed cataracts, the teeming and varied opulence of a mind of boundless sympathy, the grand luxuriance of nature; and when the curbless intensity of the preacher's fire burned in its every word, when the glittering eye, and glowing features, and fiery gesticulation, proved that even its abundance sufficed not to body forth the earnestness of Chalmers, all thought of bombast or diffuseness fled, and the effect was tremendous. The true power of the orator was his; he could subject men not merely to his reason, but to his will. The witnesses to the effect of his eloquence are so numerous and explicit, that doubt is no longer possible on the subject. When the thunder was at its height, when his eye blazed with that strange watery gleam of which we hear, men involuntarily moved their bodies, and, though in postures which would ordinarily occasion pain, were unconscious of a sensation ; when there was a pause, a sigh arose from the congregation ; strong men, even learned men, wept.

We may form some conception of the impression made by these Discourses, when even now we consider their general tenor. The theme, whatever may be said concerning its argumentative value or treatment, is sublime ; it is handled, too, precisely in the way to give it power in the pulpit ; every point is brought out with such boldness, that no eye can fail to see it ; there is no wire-drawing, no soft murmuring, no delicate pencilling, no easy meandering ; each vast wave comes rolling on, fringed with its own gorgeous foam, and echoing its own thunder. If we consent to place ourselves under the wizard eye of the orator ; if at one moment we mark its rapt and fiery gleam, as if lit in sympathy with those seraph eyes which it saw looking from the empyrean ; if, at another, we watch the deeper softness of its azure glow, while it seems to gaze on Mercy unfolding her wings ; and if we surrender ourselves to the combination of influences, as voice, features, and subject, are all at last in climax, it will surely be no longer impossible to conceive the effect, when the ocean billow, after long gathering, broke.

An elaborate and detailed criticism of these sermons is now superfluous. Many objections have been taken to their logic ; and Foster stands, doubtless, not alone, in objecting to their style. For my own part, I confess that my admiration is intense. They appear to me to have the true poetic glow ; that fusing, uniting fire burns over them, whose gleam compels you to drop your measuring line or gauging apparatus, and utter the word—genius. To accompany the preacher in his high flight seems like sailing with that archangel whom Richter, in his dream, saw bearing the mortal through the endless choirs and galaxies of immensity ; only that here we do not tremble and cry out at the overpowering spectacle of God's infinitude, for the softening light of the Cross falls continually around us. And, after all that has been said, I must consider the logic of these marvellous Discourses satisfactory. It has been said that the argument against which they are levelled is weak and obsolete. I suspect it is neither ; save in a sense applying to infidel arguments in general. Walking in a still autumn night in the country, by the faintly rustling corn-field or the lonely wood, and gazing upward to the illimitable vault, where the stars in their courses walk silent and beautiful, and where the milky-way, with its myriad worlds, lies along the purple of night like a breath of God's nostrils, is it unnatural for the human being to say, Can the Son of the Almighty have come to die for atoms such as I, in an atom world like ours ? If such a thought is powerless with many minds, it is very forcible with others : I know it to be so with some. And after calm reflection, what do we finally arrive at in the case, as the seemly and reasonable attitude of him who is a feeble and puny denizen of earth, yet a spirit of thought and immortality ? It appears to be twofold. Looking towards the stars, it is seemly for him to bow his head in lowliness and gratitude, and to say, with the monarch minstrel, "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him, and the son of man, that Thou regardest him ?" But then, looking to the corn God has raised to nourish him, the animals over which God has made him king, the fair world He has from of old prepared for him, the still princely retinue or army of faculties he has given him, to master it and to count the stars, he may turn with reasonable and faithful joy to the Son of David, and listen to Him as he says, "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow : they toil not, neither do they spin : and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" This seems the true attitude. This last is the satisfactory answer to the infidel argument; and it is this answer which Chalmers, with all the force lent it by modern science, re-enunciated. The telescope may keep man humble, but it cannot crush him into insignificance; the microscope shows ever how the world of littleness stretches away, as if to infinitude, under his feet. And if the might of Omnipotence can arrange, in their unspeakable delicacy, the tendrils of the corals in the depths of ocean, and bring to maturity colonies and nations, in all the animation of their life and the glow of their costume, within the bosom of a flower, and reach a perfection of beauty, after which art toils at what may be called an infinite distance, in the iris, hung in every mountain brook, will God not wipe away a stain as if from His own forehead, will He not humble His great adversary on a territory he hoped he had won, will He not amend the one imperfection in the world—sin? And is it not in consistence with the glory of His name, that, thus to vindicate Himself, He has made a display of mercy and condescension at which heaven and earth may stand agaze?

Chalmers had now fairly reached the pinnacle of Scottish renown. The heart of the populace throbbed responsive to his eloquence; and from perhaps the highest personal authority then in Scotland, from Jeffrey of the Edinburgh Review, it received this testimony: "I know not what it is, but there is something altogether remarkable about that man. It reminds me more of what one reads of as the effect of the eloquence of Demosthenes, than anything I ever heard."

On the day after his arrival in the metropolis, he preached in Surrey Chapel. The service began at eleven; at seven in the morning the place was filled. At length Chalmers ascends the pulpit, and all eyes are centred there. The sermon commences. The face of the preacher has a certain heavy look, over its pale, rough-hewn, leonine lineaments ; his eyelids droop slightly, and his eyes have something at once dreamy and sad in their expression ; his voice is thin, somewhat broken, unimpressive ; his tone may be called drawling, and his dialect is broadly, almost unintelligibly, provincial. The London audience sits cool and business-like, not given to tumultuous emotion, and accustomed to moral essays ; eye meets eye in half-disappointed surmise. But look, Chalmers is beginning to move ; he gradually works himself into the heart of his subject ; his voice is becoming loud, rich, impassioned : the Londoners sit still unmoved, but now no eyes are wandering ; the preacher warms, the latent heat within beginning to be evolved ; he curbs his spirit sternly, but it will bear him away : his auditors are silent, a consciousness of some strange enchaining power begins to pervade the place, but the light in the thousand eyes fixed on Chalmers is still in great measure that of criticism ; the Londoners still know where they are : the orator warms swiftly to white heat ; his face is radiant with earnestness ; the distending eyeball swims ; at last the fire within lights in it that wondrous watery gleam which tells that the spirit of Chalmers is in the last passion and agony of its might : his audience have forgotten where they sit ; they bend forward in simultaneous assent to his every paragraph ; he has chained them to the chariot-wheels of his eloquence.

Report of the new wonder flies over London. Fashion hears of him in her glittering saloons ; senators and peers speak of him in their halls and cabinets. The highest and gayest in the land crowd to hear him. "All the world," writes Wilberforce, in his journal, "wild about Chalmers." Chancellors and Lords desire to be introduced to him ; the Lord Mayor visits him ; mighty London seems to do him homage.

The spectacle is strange ; the test the man has to stand is searching. From the still and sequestered vale of Kilmany, he has ascended to the highest summit of contemporary fame. He was all unregarded in his quiet parish ; he has now the great ones of the earth becking and applauding round him ; there is a shout in his ears as if he were more than human. Let us not fail to perceive the danger and difficulty of his situation. The assenting voice of one fellow-creature has been said by one of the best of judges to “strengthen even infinitely” any opinion a man may have formed, and a flattering opinion of one’s self is so easy to strengthen ; amid the vociferous plaudits of thousands, or hundreds of thousands, to retain one’s self-estimate, undiminished, unmagnified, unwavering, is difficult indeed. And how many, even of the powerfully-minded, have failed, when popular applause,—that sun whose stroke so often is madness,—has centred its rays upon them ! Edward Irving was no ordinary man ; yet he who, in his noble and beautiful eulogium on this “freest, brotherliest, bravest human soul” he ever met, bears witness to his force and healthiness, tells us also that he swallowed the intoxicating poison of fame, and had not “force of natural health” to cast it out. Edinburgh celebrity contributed largely to the ruin of Burns ; applause, every one knows, inflated and befooled Rousseau ; Byron, unconscious perhaps of the fact, and in words scornfully denying it, was really the slave of fame,—one might almost say, of mode ; and to what length might the list not be extended ? There is a masterly touch in Ovid’s description of Phæton and his unhappy ride. The chariot has just reached the zenith. Hitherto the aspiring driver has kept a tight rein, better or worse, with fair success. But now he looks from his imperial station on the vast round of the earth ; its oceans, its forests, its mountains, its cities, are outspread below him ; all seem to gaze towards him, and drink glory from his eye. He cannot endure it ; his brain reels, his eye swims, the weight of his office oppresses his individuality, the fire-snorting coursers drag the reins from his relaxing hand, and tear away after their own mad will. The man who can see the world gazing on him unmoved, is the man intended by nature to be looked at ! Chalmers triumphantly bears the test. Let the world say what it will, he knows he is just Chalmers of Kilmany, neither more nor less,—one whose power, be it what it may, neither inflates nor collapses in the popular gale. All who approach him find him simple, unassuming, devout. Nay, his instinct of reality is rather offended than otherwise ; his heart whispers that much of this tumult is mere vocal vacancy. As principalities and powers cluster round him, he stands quiet and self-possessed, unabashed, unastonished, unalarmed ; his greatness has its source within. No man could more thoroughly weigh popular acclaim, and more firmly pronounce it wanting ; beautiful ardours and rapturous admirations would have been somewhat damped in London, had his ultimate definition of such matters been by any chance heard—“the hosannahs of a drivelling generation !”

One other remark must be added, ere we accompany Chalmers back to Scotland. There was a day when he spoke of “literary distinction” as his “pride and consolation ;” there was a day when this London notoriety would have appeared to him almost sublime. Is it unfair to suppose that the light of that eye which, though invisible, he now seems ever to see resting on him, has shed an equalizing radiance over chancellors and peasants, and made sublunary approbation a matter of quite secondary moment ?

Returning to Glasgow, his popularity continues at the same unprecedented height as before ; his study becomes a presence-chamber for guests of all ranks and from all quarters. But it is never through the general eye that you can really see Chalmers ; it is when you mark him unbosoming himself, in tender, artless affection, to his sister Jane, or warming the hearts of all around him by his hearty geniality and rough sagacity, or turning from the despised "popularity of stare, and pressure, and animal heat," to look for any plant which the Lord of the vineyard has honoured him by using his hand in planting.

Of his life in this inner circle, we have an illustration which is too beautiful and of too profound significance to be omitted ; he who cannot read in it the true nature and the intrinsic nobleness of Chalmers can interpret no biographic trait whatever. A gentleman named Wright, an intimate acquaintance, meets him one day in company. Usually the centre of cheerfulness and pleasure, Chalmers is to-day downcast and heavy. Mr Wright, happening to walk with him on the way home, ventures to inquire whether he is ill. He is well enough, but must confess he is not at rest. His heart is grieved. "It is a matter," he says, "that presses very grievously upon me. In short, the truth is, I have mistaken the way of my duty to God in at all coming to your city. I am doing no good ; God has not blessed, and is not blessing, my ministry here." He remembers Kilmany and its one hundred and fifty families ; he thinks how sure and how beautiful the work of God was there ; he has exchanged his earnest ministrations from house to house, for inevitable and perpetual visits of ceremony or entertainment ; his parish church, filled with devout and humble hearers, for a mixed and staring throng, many of whose members come to see the preacher. It is like going from reality, which he loves as his heart's blood, to hollowness and pretence, which he hates with inborn and immeasurable hatred. His heart sinks at the idea, that in his hands the work of a Christian pastor should degenerate into emotional excitement or literary admiration ; that his portion is to be mere earthly renown, instead of the glory of having turned even one to righteousness. His eye is where a Christian pastor's should be ; fame, adulation, popularity, will, he knows, be shrivelled up in the first breath of eternity ; while an immortal soul, saved by his means, will be a gem in a crown eternally brightening. In friendly simplicity and greatness of heart, seeking the relief which every noble nature finds in sympathy, he reveals his sorrow to his friend. And, lo ! he finds in his answer a solace which he little expects. Mr Wright details to him a case in which he knows the ministry of Chalmers to have been effectual in rousing a soul to deep personal godliness, in making it flee to Christ for salvation. " Ah," exclaims his delighted and grateful listener, " Ah, Mr Wright, what blessed, what comforting news you give me ! for really I was beginning to fail, from an apprehension that I had not been acting according to the will of God in coming to your city."

We have still, however, to contemplate Chalmers in his principal aspect as a force and influence among men. That which, in our estimation, gives to his career its highest grandeur, and ranks him with the great ones of time, is the tremendous power with which he grasped one vast idea ; the idea of Christianity in application to national existence, the idea of the Christianization of the State. To use his own magnificent words, the aim of his life was to nurse the empire to Christianity. It is fine to see, as it were, his great heart throbbing with this sublime conception ; to mark how his enthusiasm always gushes out afresh as it comes before him ; to listen to the incidental tones of lyric rapture which break from his lips, when the light of the mighty thought, as of the coming Christian morning, strikes along his brow. This is the idea which makes the life of Chalmers epic. The nineteenth century is marked by the triumphant march of science on the one hand, and by the awakening of the peoples on the other. Banners innumerable have been unfolded as banners of national salvation : there has been the cloudy ensign of transcendentalism ; there has been the standard of mere science and political philosophy, with its meagre diagrams and cold metallic lustre ; there has been the black flag of atheism : Chalmers, with the gait of a champion, stepped forward with the ancient banner, the old legend still burning on its massive folds as in letters of golden fire, "In Christ conquer !" Round that banner, in the age of science and democracy, he called us to rally, and told how the fight would go.

But it was not only the dauntless valour and tireless perseverance with which he proclaimed that Christianity alone can save the nations, which distinguished him. These might have characterized a very inferior man. It was his clear perception of the position in which Christianity now stands to peoples, it was his essential agreement in the axioms on which he proceeded, with the soundest and greatest intellects of this and all ages, it was his statesmanlike comprehension of the main outlines of the method by which Christianity is to be applied to national life, that stamped him as the highest practical Christian thinker of his age. Of an intellectual power which enabled him to sum and master the lessons science has taught, and the means science has provided, for the amelioration of the community, he was able to discern what place Christianity may occupy in relation to these. Agreeing with all the master intellects among men, that it is only by the inspiration of moral life into a nation that its physical life can prosper ; and differing from Mr Carlyle only in that he deemed the one source of moral life a personal God, and the grand instrument of moral life the religion of Jesus, he yet did not turn with contemptuous indignation from the advocates of special scientific methods ; he took the different plan of supplementing their deficiency, of speaking the truth without which their systems were dead. He did not, with indignant stamp of his foot, shake to pieces as worthless the mechanism of science ; he said it was an invaluable, an indispensable mechanism ; but he brought a coal kindled in heaven to put it in motion, to inspire it with life, to spread over it a new and glorious light. In language of glowing poetry, he represents Christianity visiting earth from the celestial realms, her first and all-embracing object to bring to men treasures of immortal joy, yet, by a sublime necessity, scattering beatitude in the paths of mortal life. With the ancient heroic devotion, he toiled for the realization of his idea ; no old crusader or mediæval king strove more valiantly in faith or in patriotism than he, to be the Christian divine demanded by the nineteenth century. If it is the harmonizing, concentrating might of one great idea pervading a character and life, which is recognised as imparting to these an epic grandeur, surely we can affirm such of the life and character of Chalmers.

With the glance of one who sees before and after, far along the centuries past and future, the high aim of Chalmers was, by one gigantic impulse, to raise the Church of his country to what the nation and the age required. Town and country he would divide into manageable parishes ; the Presbyterian mechanism of the Kirk-Session he would bring to bear with its innate power and intimacy ; over all would preside a set of godly and energetic pastors, who would superintend and vitalize the whole. Thus, in a thousand streams, the very water of life would circulate through the veins of the nation. A personal intimacy and friendship would bind pastor to peasant, rank to rank ; “the golden chain of life” would be unbroken, and it would be none the less beautiful, binding, or pleasant, that it was anchored within the veil. Over the land there would pass the breath of a moral renovation ; every other renovation would follow in benign and natural sequence ; it would look to heaven with one broad smile of peace and contentment, like the face of a strong man awakening to health after long sickness.

His method of carrying out his plans in his own parish, the example he offered to the pastors of Scotland and the world of their efficacy, was perhaps the most triumphant portion of his whole acting in the matter. Here it is important to observe him ; new discoveries of his intellectual energy and his moral worth dawn on us at every step. We saw formerly that, in the meeting of all the winds of fame, he could preserve unfluttered his self-estimate, and work as calmly as in quiet Kilmany. He could stand alone. We learn now that he can draw others around him, work with them, and teach them to work. Here it is that the true kindly talent comes out. He knows the genuine worker, he attracts him towards himself, he strikes into him new fire ; he can light a sympathetic flame in the bosom of each with whom he acts, so that he becomes a miniature of himself. Everything yields to his contagious energy ; the very Town Council of Glasgow assent to his views ; his subordinates follow him as the carriages follow the steam-engine. Chancellors and duchesses, and the tumult of crowds encircling Chalmers, might be gadflies round a sunflower ; but we cannot be deceived here. Look upon him in the heart of Glasgow, as he dives into noisome vennels, or feels his way up dark winding stairs, seeking out destitution, seeing the fact in its own nakedness, looking his foe in the face, and bringing to smite it that one weapon he bears, the sword of the Spirit. Then you see Chalmers. And his great experiment prevails : Christianity, with Chalmers and the Kirk-Session he directs as its instruments, is found to meet every social want in the populous and difficult parish of St John's.

It is well known that Chalmers was during his whole life an implacable enemy of the English poor-law. In the fundamental proposition on which he based his opposition, that a poor-law endangers the feeling of independence, and consequently the morality of a people, by converting the petition for an alms into the demand of a right, he has been agreed with by men of the most directly opposed character and opinions, and of the highest intellectual powers. The acknowledged master in the schools of political economy, David Ricardo, records his emphatic opinion to this effect ; his shrewd and cool-headed disciple, M'Culloch, pronounces the poor-laws "essentially injurious,"—an opinion, by the way, which renders highly astonishing his estimate of the efforts made by Chalmers against them. At the distance of a hemisphere, both in thought and sentiment, from these men,—they, as it were, in Polar cold and bareness, he in tropic thunder and luxuriance,—Mr Carlyle has expressed the same opinion. Whether these authors have been quite correct or no, I do not undertake to determine ; Dr Alison adduces a fact or two which tell strongly in an opposite direction ; the point to be noted is, that Chalmers here stood by no means alone, that his belief on the point has been treated as an axiom by such thinkers as Ricardo and Carlyle. He declared that the only sound and safe method was that of nature ; and he pronounced Christianity able to hold up the hands of nature, and strengthen her to attain the desired end in her own fair and salutary manner. To the argument that the support of the poor, if left to voluntary effort, would fall entirely on the benevolent few, he replied, that, if things were properly managed, every parish would be able, without strain or inconvenience, to support its own poor ; he might have added (perhaps, though I do not remember meeting the remark in his writings, he has added), that Christianity makes it a privilege to stretch out the hand of charity, and that this act of the benevolent may be intended as a continual rebuke of the world's selfishness, and protest against it. To the assertion that benevolence could not be depended upon, he replied, that he trusted solely neither to benevolence nor to any impulse of a fortuitous character ; but to known principles of human nature ;—the desire to rise, the sympathy of friends, on the side of the poor ; and on the side of philanthropy, the unfailing bounty of at least a chosen few. The machinery he provided is thus described in his own words :—“ We divided the parish into twenty-five parts ; and, having succeeded in obtaining as many deacons, we assigned one part to each,—thus placing under his management towards fifty families, or at an average about four hundred of a gross population. We constructed also a familiar or brief directory, which we put into their hands. It laid down the procedure which should be observed on every application that was made for relief. It was our perfect determination that every applicant of ours should be at least as well off as he would have been in any other parish of Glasgow, had his circumstances there been as well known,—so that, surrounded though we were by hostile and vigilant observers, no case of scandalous allowance, or still less of scandalous neglect, was ever made out against us. The only distinction between us and our neighbours lay in this,—that these circumstances were by us most thoroughly scrutinized, and that with the view of being thoroughly ascertained,—and that very generally, in the progress of the investigation, we came in sight of opportunities or openings for some one or other of those preventive expedients by which any act of public charity was made all the less necessary, or very often superseded altogether.” Here there is really nothing Utopian ; rather is there a deliberate and accurate calculation of means, measuring of resistance, and mastering of details. With so many inspectors, it is difficult to see how destitution could be overlooked ; with so many to scrutinize and investigate, it can hardly be conceived that any natural channel of relief, by the obtaining of work or of assistance from relatives, could be unnoticed ; with so many to inform and appeal, it would be no easy matter for benevolence to fall asleep. And then, as has been said, he proved it ; amid difficulty, obstruction, and without putting out all his force, he succeeded to the full ; every objection and sneer was at last silenced, save one. He could not shut the mouth of the gainsayer when it was alleged that, to render the machinery effective, there would in each case be required a Chalmers.

If other men despaired of the power of Christianity to heal and beautify the nation, was it not right, and noble, and valiant, that Chalmers should not do so ? His belief was no empty sound, no half-hypocrisy. The religion of Jesus, he said, has all its ancient power ; for the mechanic dispensings of a great lifeless reservoir, walled in by the State, it can give the sweet watering of nature's gentle rain ; where Law can but order relief with her iron tongue, it can set Pity by the bed of national weakness, to hallow the ministries of Mercy by their own native smile. There was a great fund of hope and valour in his breast ; he would not despair of the commonwealth ; he would not sit slothfully down in what was at best a mere negation of evil, and whose occupancy deferred the real good. The worst you can say of him here is actually and without paradox the best which could be said ; for it is that which is to be said of all the noblest of the sons of men, and which is the crown of their nobleness, namely, that they looked forward to a brightened future, as that in which it would be good, and, as it were, natural, for them to live and expatiate ; that they seemed to be messengers sent before to herald a better time, and that the mode in which they delivered their unconscious prophecy was a summons, burning with earnestness and hope, to all men to arise and inaugurate the new era now. Chalmers could not find his rest in

Of smooth and solemnized complacencies,
By which, in Christian lands, from age to age, Profession mocks performance.”

He dared the original attempt to infuse the spirit of Christianity, like vital sap, into the national frame ; he aspired to shake off from the Christian peoples that mournful sleep,—of custom, of routine, of worldliness,—which has ever, with gradual, but hitherto irresistible influence, closed the national eye, that seemed erewhile to be opened wide and kindled with empyreal fire. This is the heroic aspect of his life ; his endless battle against mere respectability and commonplace ; his valiant and life-long endeavour to set Christianity on the throne and in the heart of the nation. He is the modern Christian ; shutting his eye to nothing, acquainted with every contemporary agency, but declaring that Christianity is still able to marshal every force, and meet every requirement in social existence. And let it be boldly said that he here pointed the way in all reform which can be regarded with perfect satisfaction and unfaltering hope ; if he failed, we must just raise the same banner, and, with somewhat of his ardour, still calmly and dauntlessly bear it on : the life of Chalmers was a proclamation of the world's last hope.

In at least the special forms in which he himself had striven to reanimate the nation with Christian life, he did fail. For long years he travelled, and wrote, and argued for Church extension ; year after year he looked to every quarter of the heavens, if perchance a gleam of hope against pauperism might cheer his eye. But the day of his life drew on to a close, and the work was yet to do. Then he withdrew into his closet, and in silent heaviness of heart penned the following words ; they are to be found in Dr Hanna's last volume :—

“Sabbath, December 12, 1841.—The passage respecting Babel should not be without a humble and wholesome effect upon my spirit. I have been set on the erection of my Babel—on the establishment of at least two great objects, which, however right in themselves, become the mere objects of a fond and proud imagination, in as far as they are not prosecuted with a feeling of dependence upon God, and a supreme desire after his glory. These two objects are the deliverance of our empire from pauperism, and the establishment of an adequate machinery for the Christian and general instruction of our whole population. I am sure that, in the advancement of these, I have not taken God enough along with me, and trusted more to my own arguments and combinations among my fellows, than to prayers. There has been no confounding of tongues to prevent a common understanding, so indispensable to that co-operation without which there can be no success; but without this miracle my views have been marvellously impeded by a diversity of opinions, as great as if it had been brought on by a diversity of language. The barriers in the way of access to other men's minds have been as obstinate and unyielding as if I had spoken to them in foreign speech; and, though I cannot resign my convictions, I must now—and surely it is good to be so taught—I must now, under the experimental sense of my own helplessness, acknowledge, with all humility, yet with hope in the efficacy of a blessing from on high still in reserve for the day of God's own appointed time, that except 'the Lord build the house, the builders build in vain.' ”

The spectacle of Chalmers, as he pens these lines, is assuredly the most sublime afforded by his life. The very health and tenderness of childhood are in the heart of the old warrior; he brings his sword, and lays it down at eventide, willing, even with tears, to acknowledge that it is because of the weakness of his arm, and the faithlessness of his heart, that the enemy has not been vanquished.

Of the causes of this ultimate failure, which, however, might be a failure more in appearance than reality, it is unnecessary to say much.

If there was any great supplement to be made to the general system of Chalmers's thought and opinion, it was an adequate sense, on the one hand, of the difficulty of his enterprise, and, on the other, of the chief and indispensable means by which it could be accomplished ; on the one hand, of the impotence of mere machinery, and, on the other, of the extreme rarity and inestimable worth of true and mighty men. It is an invisible force that is wanted, rather than wheel-work ; the latter will be provided with comparative ease ; the most elaborate machinery, without this living force, may hang vacant in the winds, like a rattling skeleton where once was the throb of life and the flush of health. The Church-state of Arnold—kings and senators teaching wisdom and doing the bidding of God, the powers of evil aghast at the new vision of Christian unity and love ; the manageable parishes, and country studded with churches, of Chalmers ;—alas ! one must cast a questioning, or at least a warning, glance towards all such schemes. The universal Church, that looks so fair in the distance, of which all the formerly separate churches are but pillars, all within whose walls are true Christians, all without whose walls are Pagans ;—can we look long at the imposing structure without seeing, as if emerging from beneath its crumbling battlements, a great whited sepulchre, uniform—as death ? A country filled with clergymen, a church in every street, a parish in every valley ;—must we not here also proclaim that danger impends ? In our crossgrained world, every good thing has a counterfeit which is doubly evil : self-respect, recognised as indispensable to completeness of character, is aped by impudence and conceit ; politeness, one of nature's fairest and costliest flowers, which can grow only in a rich and kindly soil, is mimicked by etiquette, a poor gumflower ; sanctity, the attribute of the sons of the morning, may, by human eyes, be confounded with sanctimoniousness spurned of devils. And it is a well-known law that the nobler the thing is the baser is its counterfeit. A hypocritic smile, a traitorous kiss, are worse than a scowl of honest hate or a stab of open vengeance. If, then, a godly minister is an angel of light, a godless pastor is a very angel of darkness. Between the real Christian pastor, whose worth cannot be summed, and the indolent, greedy, black-coated loungeur, who burdens with his maintenance, who blights by his example, who is a continual living profanation of what is holiest, there is but an invisible difference. Get your men, and all is got. A Brainerd finds himself a congregation among North American Indians ; a Schwartz, among the swamps and fevers of the Carnatic ; but churches will not by any natural necessity attract ministers. This immoveable fact we must always take along with us. Chalmers, no doubt, knew it, and it will ultimately, as seems probable, be found that it was by acting on individual men over the country that his influence was most powerful : but he did not grasp it in all its mighty import, and make it consciously and avowedly the basis of his operations : one man alone has proclaimed this doctrine in all the emphasis which is its due—Thomas Carlyle. Ah ! what a prospect might we have had now had Carlyle and Chalmers toiled side by side in the Church of Scotland ! Let us not, however, deem that we shall be sinless if we neglect the truth to which each has called our attention.

After four years' incumbency in the parish of St John's, Chalmers removed, in November 1823, to St Andrews, to fill the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University there. His main reason for quitting Glasgow deserves notice. His experiment in the parish of St John's silenced, as was said, all objections but one. This one was the determined assertion that the whole success was due to the eloquence and energy, in one word, to the individual character, of Chalmers. It is fine to see how this galls him. He exclaims against the "nauseous eulogies" which would turn into an empty compliment to him the demonstration of the power of Christianity. But it is vain to argue : the one reply they make to every appeal is, St John's parish is worked by Chalmers.

“ There was obviously no method by which to disabuse them of this strange impression, but by turning my back on the whole concern ; and thus testing the inherent soundness and efficacy of the system by leaving it in other hands.” And so he goes to St Andrews ; let the cause prosper, whatever may become of him !

In 1828 he is inaugurated as Professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh,—an office he continues to fill until within a few years of his death. Over his students he exercises the same powerful and benign influence which he has shed on all who have come within his sphere. His prelections tend to produce godly and ardent pastors, rather than nice controversialists ; he is, though not so named, the greatest among professors of Pastoral Theology ; his spirit goes over Scotland incarnated in young, vigorous, aggressive Christian ministers.

We now approach that epoch in the life of Chalmers during which, for the last time, he was to act a great and prominent part before the eyes of men. Within the circle of his sympathies and the ken of his powers he had embraced all the leading interests of the empire ; with a gigantic and hallowed energy he had striven to reanimate them by an inspiration of divine fire. And with a certain hopefulness, which, though damped by opposition, could not altogether die, he had ever looked to the endowments and machinery of that Scottish Church which he loved with the double affection of patriotism and pride. Whether it came of the substantial and practical nature of his intellect, or whether it arose from his deep loyalty and conservative tendencies, he was a decided and inflexible advocate of religious establishments. But, with the views of a statesman, he was also a divine. Never for a moment did he conceive the unchristian idea that it was State support which gave existence or power to a Church. The doctrine of the distinct existence of the Church of Christ he grasped with all the firmness of his powers, and discerned with all their clearness ; whatever his faith in the efficacy of Christianity, it was in a Christianity not the bonds slave of man, but the messenger of God.

It is, of course, unnecessary to detail in this place the various stages of the controversy which preceded the celebrated Disruption of 1843 in the Scottish National Church, or to define, with precision and in detail, the argumentative positions taken by the respective parties. It were, however, unpardonable altogether to shun the question. Chalmers acted a part therein too prominent to render this permissible ; while the movement itself bears closely on one of the main general objects of this little work, the ascertainment of the actual power and practical availability of what names itself Christian principle in our age.

To speak in a way that may look somewhat pedantic, we have to discover, as the essential points in the matter before us, the idea of a State, the idea of a Church, and the relation between the two ; wherein each of these,—the State, the Church, and the relation,—essentially consists.

It is a fundamental axiom in the whole discussion, that the glory of God is the end and intent both of Church and State. The arguments adducible by reason to prove that the end of individual existence is God's glory can be brought, perhaps without exception, to prove the same fact in the case of governments. But let no rash conclusions be drawn from this all-important declaration. Every man works for God's glory when he performs the peculiar task assigned him by God ; it may be implied in his thorough discharge of this task, that he abstain from all other efforts and functions, however plausibly he may be invited thereto ; and the remark applies equally to all beneath the government of God.

This axiom laid down, we have to take but one step, when the whole matter clears up before us. Man's nature, individual and social, is twofold, spiritual and physical. That he has a physical nature, that he is a denizen of earth, and has to work that he may live, no argument is required to prove. That his nature also is spiritual, that, as a spirit, he is connected with a system of things not terrestrial but celestial, not temporal but eternal, is attested by reason. Here, too, nothing more is strictly necessary than a simple statement of the fact.

Broadly contemplated, the Church is a union among men, considered as spiritual beings, and for spiritual ends, and the State a union for objects of a strictly terrestrial nature.

Has God appointed to Church and State, thus broadly discriminated, respective duties? And what are they?

The function of a State, viewed in the relation indicated, is confined to terrestrial matters. A government is, as it were, God's commissioner to see that the national farm be thoroughly tilled. The State's object is to render itself safe from without, and, to express all in one word, prosperous within. This does not exhaust its duty in relation to other States, but it comprehends all its duties towards itself. And for the attainment of this object what is necessary? It is needful, in one word, that the national virtues flourish. For safety, it is requisite that the people be courageous, sober, observant of an oath; for prosperity, it is necessary that they be industrious, so that the nation collectively may derive the greatest possible benefit from its soil, climate, and mineral wealth, and that they be commercially upright, so that the rights of all may be balanced, and the general welfare subserved. A government prevents internally every form of aggression by man on man; this last is the precise, scientific definition of crime in a nation. There is a morality whose exclusive theatre is earth; there is an integrity between man and man which supports commerce ; a national steadfastness and industry which avert revolution ; a loyalty, a patriotism, a valour, which girdle the State as with bayonets. These constitute work sufficient for any body corporate.

There are men who consider such achievements as have been glanced at above, and the general morality indicated, to be all which can concern men and nations. Atheistic morals are by nature and necessity confined to such. A man might remain immaculate, on the system of D'Holbach, or Godwin, or Comte, though he had never believed in or heard of a God. In all such systems, man's whole duties are his duties to man.

But, if we believe that man is even now the denizen of a higher world than that of sense, if we attribute reality to a spiritual province of things, a morality and a government different from these are seen, in natural and inevitable sequence, to emerge. This is celestial morality ; and the body corporate which bears the relation to it which secular government bears to secular morality is the Church. All that a brother man is empowered to demand of another is, that he give him free and fair play for all his faculties, that he harm him not ; God may demand of a man that he be holy in thought, heart, and action ; terrestrial morality may be called harmlessness ; celestial, holiness. To profane the name of God may imply no harm to a fellow-man, but it may be an infraction of man's duty to God. The devotion of a certain time to the worship of God may or may not be of direct and obvious advantage to the community, but it may be required by God. In short, there may be a surveillance of man as a denizen of the spiritual world, as well as a surveillance of him as a denizen of earth. And so, by a sequence as strict as in the case of the State, a separate set of functions arise for the Church.

If we have been following correctly, though for a short way, the light of reason, it seems to have led us to the greater light of revelation. This teaches us that man at first was not a fettered bond-slave, that he had not to purchase existence by toil, that he was not cursed with labour ; that sin deprived him of his spiritual birthright, condemned him to work that body and soul might remain together, and set Death over him as a ruthless taskmaster to keep him in the furrow. But it teaches us also that those higher regions, towards which reason wistfully but weakly looks, are real ; that we are spirits still ; that God is yet our King ; that immortality and spiritual joys may again be ours ; and that we even now exist in a system of relations which bind us to the spirit-world. Secular government has been rendered necessary by the fall ; the Church exists by virtue of the promise. Both of them, viewed from the stand-point of eternity, and regarded as separate systems of mechanism, are expedients, and both temporary. The State must cease to exist when men are purely spiritual, and mutual injury is impossible ; it will cease, as was formerly said, when justice and love shall have become one. The Church, too, viewed as a visible organization, will conduct men but a certain way ; it will vanish at the gates of heaven. It finds man in a condition of lapse and distemper, it aims to restore him to a paradisaical state : this done, it will pass away, enveloped in a cloud of glory. For the present, the duties of State and Church are discriminated ; neither is delivered from direct responsibility to God ; but the Church respects the first table of the law, the State the second.

A detailed proof from Scripture that the State has duties of its own is unnecessary ; and it would lead us too far to enter upon a detailed proof and definition from Holy Writ of the powers and duties of the Church. The general course, however, and nature of the evidence in the latter case may be at a glance apprehended. Either, with Whately, we might determine the powers which pertain of necessity to every corporation, and, showing that the Church is, by its Scriptural definition, of that nature, infer that these powers belong to

it. Or we might cite the express declarations of our Lord, by which He committed the power of discipline, the power, under Him, of opening and shutting the kingdom of heaven, to His Church ; declarations with which, whatever they mean, it cannot even be maintained that any terrestrial power can interfere, and whose meaning seems as clear and explicit as words can make it. And we might point, further, to the indubitable practice of the early Church ; we might instance, as absolutely sufficient and conclusive, the case of the Church of Corinth. The authority of Paul as a preacher of Christianity will not be questioned by any to whom I now address myself ; the fact that he points out the duty of expelling a certain member from the Church is not within the reach of cavil ; and the whole nature and compass of the discipline of a Christian Church are unfolded in his general directions on the subject. In a word, it might be shown, by clear and conclusive arguing, that the early Christian Church exercised powers within itself according to a law given it by inspiration.

Any penalty inflicted by a Church will, of necessity, be purely spiritual. The offence committed is one against God ; the punishment with which it is to be visited can have reference solely to Him. A physical punishment is, by the nature of the case, out of the question. If the member expelled or excommunicated laughs at the decree, it is, as respects visible suffering inflicted by men, null and void. It is true, indeed, that if the inhabitants of the country in which the decree takes effect are all Christians, and consequently attach weight to the displeasure of the Church, considerable discomfort must result from discountenance by his brethren. But this is a remark which applies to the working of every possible corporation.

Having now granted that the provinces of Church and State are severed, and having laid it down that the former, in its requirements and penalties, has exclusive reference, directly or indirectly, to celestial morality, it may seem difficult for us to find any mode in which they can legitimately and beneficially be allied. In point of fact, however, this has become a simple matter. The State is bound to entertain the question, regarding every agency which may present itself, Does it further the views entertained, the objects aimed at, by the State ? A careful attention may be needful here : truth in the matter lies close to error. It is one thing to ask, Will the Church, used as a mechanism by the State, promote State objects ? and another to ask the absolutely distinct question, Will the Church, acting solely for its own ends and by its own laws, promote that morality which the State requires, and is appointed by God to require ? The first is a question the Church of Christ dare not even listen to ; the second is that which the State is bound to ask, and to which the Church may render a decisive answer, and one on which an alliance between Church and State may be reared.

It is perhaps not too much to say that we are here at the very spring and original fountain of all the errors, theoretic and practical, which have encumbered this subject ; that by a distinct recollection and recognition of the separate provinces of celestial and terrestrial morality, and of the respective functions of Church and State, such errors would have been obviated. The Church, in virtue of its origin, by charter of its King, in the discharge of those duties which alone render it necessary and existent in the sum of things, concerns itself with celestial morality ; with a morality which lies beyond the pale of human law, whose rejection may infringe no right of man with man, which is between man and his God. Reason, in its highest and purest moments, declares the province and functions of the Church to be real ; the Word of God ratifies this decision, assigns the Church certain duties, and appoints for it a certain government. The only offer it can or dare listen to from the State is one which will guarantee its action as a Church. Turning to the State, on the other hand, we find it answerable to God for the maintenance of the common weal ; and it is but another form of expressing this to say, that it is answerable for the promotion of those virtues on which the safety and prosperity of a commonwealth depend. When a Church comes before it, it has simply to inquire whether that Church, acting in the only way in which a Church can act, will promote public morality ; in other words, whether the promotion of celestial morality will further that other morality by which a State subsists.

And what answer is it right for a State to render to this question ? To omit a consideration of other cases, it is surely plain that a State and Church naming the name of Christ can satisfy each other here, so as to form an alliance, not merely of harmless, but of eminently beneficent nature. State and Church hold their powers from the same hand ; God has appointed them to perform different functions, but they are united by the bond of a common service. Their powers are co-ordinate, but they mutually assist and establish each other. The one grand argument to prove that the State ought to be in kindly alliance with the Church, ought to countenance, and to its ability support it, is this : That reason, history, and Scripture, blend their testimonies to show, that religion is the only safeguard of a nation ; that love to one's neighbour can never nationally subsist, save as dependent upon love to one's God.

Observe how close truth here lies to error. The Church, forgetting that its province is essentially and exclusively spiritual, that its penalties can be terrible in the esteem of a man only in so far as he is a Christian and believes in its power with God (with the qualification formerly mentioned), oversteps its bound, and touches a man's terrestrial possessions ; fines, tortures, slays him. This is an anomaly in nature ; no Church can have power to touch a hair of a man's head, or an ear of his corn. This error has taken form in a system which has not failed to illustrate its baneful effects, the system of Popery.

But in our day it is an error of a very different order which prevails. It is the error of regarding the Church as an organization to be looked on as primarily and directly subservient to the interests of State morality. This ignores celestial morality, and, by turning the Church into a system of police, positively annihilates it. A Church which should be merely a piece of State mechanism, is easily conceivable. It would simply relinquish its native functions as connected with celestial morality. A secular government desires that men be upright, and sober, and brave ; but it directly subserves no end of State that men believe in an everlasting reward and a heavenly King ; yet, if the Church has a distinct existence, these must be of capital importance for it. A Church is required to proclaim from her pulpits a morality immaculately pure ; Government may find, or imagine it finds, such morality reflect in no flattering manner on its own measures : nay, it may desire the advocacy of its measures, directly or indirectly, from the pulpit ; and so the process may go on extending and deepening, till the very essence and origin of a Church are forgotten. And yet, do not ideas, tending directly to this result, pervade society in our day ? Is it not a common notion among the members of our National Churches, that they are Churches in virtue of their connection with the State ? Is it not a fact that many excellent persons in our Churches, in the Church of England for instance, would apply the term of schism to a separation from the State ? As if the State made the establishment of England a Church, as if it could exercise no function apart from the State, as if it would be equivalent to its extinction as a Church, to throw it again into the condition in which that of Corinth was when it received its doctrine from the mouth of Paul ! Among the Dissenters, on the other hand, and in what may be called a negative form, the same idea has extensive prevalence. It seemed perfectly absurd to Foster to hear it asserted, as the Scotch Non-intrusion party astonished him by asserting, that the State might endow, but could never regulate, a Church. As if, forsooth, the question of endowment or non-endowment were a vital, or even an important one, in the case ! The grand question is, Whether the State is bound to sanction, countenance, and promote the Church ; settle this affirmatively, and you have settled the question of an establishment : whether the form of support which consists in handing it a certain portion of money is sound and legitimate or not, is a different question altogether, and of very subordinate importance. To imagine that the acceptance of a certain form of support implied an abnegation of distinctive and essential power and existence, was surely an egregious error, and one which, fallen into by such an intellect as Foster's, indicated prevailing ignorance as to the real nature and functions of a Church.

It is not possible too severely to denounce this great heresy. A Church such we have seen men imagine for themselves would not necessarily turn men to God ; it would merely preserve them in a state of respectability and loyalty. This is against the very idea of a Christian Church ; if it becomes universal, religion, strictly speaking, is as good as dead in our Churches. The sister establishments may, doubtless, go on for a time ; and it may even be deemed desirable by many without their pale that they should still continue to subsist. Evils there are which they may certainly obstruct. But if they become simply a part of the government mechanism for the quiet guidance of the nation ; if they are to be primarily and undeniably hills of dead earth heaped on the Enceladus of modern revolutionism ; if their strength is to be made up of the many who, having no religion of their own, take that which comes to hand with a government sanction ; if their members are to be, not Christians, but “ respectable persons ;” if their piety is to be, not the reverent upturning of the finite eye to the Infinite God, but a fluctuating accommodation to the religious fashions of the day—that goes once to church, or twice, as is the mode ; that subscribes to missions, and gets up sales for charitable purposes, or does not, as is the mode ; that has family prayers or not, as is the mode—then they may indeed remain for a time, and even do their work, and get their reward, but the first blast of millennial Christianity will sweep them utterly away. The Tyrians chained Apollo to the statue of Dagon, but Alexander laid their towers in the dust all the same ! Revolution is fearful ; the unchained masses, foaming maddened in atheistic frenzy, are fearful ; but Christianity chained in the temple of Mammon is the most fearful of all.

The principles now sketched, or rather the one principle of the separate existence and co-ordinate Divine origin of the Church, in perfect independence of the State, constituted the vital element in the long struggle which issued in the rending asunder of the Church of Scotland. To one out of the din of conflict, who contemplates the matter in the stillness of distance, the whole becomes absolutely plain. I shall by no means assert that there were no such obscuring or confounding influences around those who were parties in the debate, as to render it conceivable, and consistent with honesty, that they should oppose that view of the case taken by the party of Chalmers ; and, plain as it seems to me, that the question was one touching expressly the principles just laid down, there is perhaps no person now in Scotland who would refuse assent in terms to what has been said. Yet, putting the argument of the party which opposed the majority in the most favourable light possible, what does it amount to? Suppose that the Church, in admitting the ministers of chapels of ease to a full and equal share in every ministerial function, did overstep the letter of its legal powers, and that the whole actings of Government towards it during the struggle were influenced by this consideration, how does it affect the question? It seems merely to clear it up, and to bring it within a narrow compass. If a Church possess corporate freedom, we shall agree that it has those powers which belong by nature to a corporation. These we may as well take from Whately; no one will say he fixes the standard too high. Corporate freedom implies that the body in question has officers, rules, a power of discipline, and an authority to admit or exclude members. Now, when Chalmers in London declared the Church of Scotland free, it either was so in the above sense, or it was not. If it was, then it is but a statement of an obvious fact, that it was competent to it to admit the chapel ministers to its full membership. If it was not free, if Chalmers was mistaken, if, from any cause whatsoever, or in any circumstances, this right was called in question, it was necessary, at whatever expense, that it should be vindicated. It will be said that this act of admission on the part of the Church affected, indirectly but unquestionably, the civil rights of certain individuals. Be it so; provision has been made against the objection: if a time had come when civil rights, when endowment, in one form or another, interfered with the very life of the Church, the time had also come when it behoved that Church to declare, that its perfect severance from all endowment was, strictly speaking, of infinitely less moment than that there should remain the faintest doubt of its freedom. It is, besides, a well-known fact, that the Church, ere laying its endowments at the foot of the State, expressed its willingness to surrender all control over the money paid to those inducted into its parishes. That fatal error, however, which has been noted, prevailed widely. Men deemed it something anomalous and unheard of, that a Church should receive money from a State, and yet possess a jurisdiction absolutely distinct from that of the secular government.

Chalmers, looking at the whole question with the eye at once of a statesman and of a divine, saw into its essence, and took his position accordingly. With no elaborate searching or arguing, his piercing eye flashed at once through all sophistry to the truth that the life of the Church was in danger. It was with a certain astonishment and sorrow that he fought his last battle. If ever there beat a loyal heart, it was in his bosom. Since the day when he wept in the garden which recalled the glories of Marlborough,—since the day he had enlisted in the volunteers, chaplain and lieutenant,—since the day he had invoked death to smite him ere his country fell,—he had ever loved kingship, and national steadfastness, and the dignity of an ancestral Church. He knew that the Church of his fathers was throbbing with spiritual life, as she had not done for two centuries; he saw her missionaries going to the ends of the earth; he saw her blooming into new fruitfulness at home, and casting her mantle over all the population. It was with dismay and amazement that he witnessed the infatuation of the Government; that he listened to the unspeakable nonsense uttered about clerical oppression, Popery, liberty of the subject, &c.; that he saw Conservatism in Scotland trying to get the tough old Presbyterian Samson, his hair grown after two centuries of weakness, to be a mere maker of sport for it. As he said of his parting from his dear sequestered Kilmany, there was tearing of the heartstrings there!

Yet shall we not say that there was something fine in the spectacle of Chalmers contending at the head of the Church of Scotland, for the fundamental doctrine that the Church of Christ owes its existence to no fiat of the State, to no dole of public money, but to the word of its Master, and to that alone? That it was the duty of the State to support the Church, he held to be irrefragable ; but to make the Church, not a fire which it fed with fuel, but a machine which it regulated and worked, he saw to be a fundamental heresy. With a mind perfectly settled on the question, and with an intrepidity which his known and enthusiastic respect for constituted authorities rendered the more conspicuous and the more noble, he calmly yet unflinchingly contended. His hair was growing white, and a deeper stillness was settling in his eye, though the old liquid fire would at times gleam out ; his fame had spread over the old world and the new ; he had been flattered by the highest aristocracy of the land ; yet he was still the same devout humble Christian that he had become when first the light of God opened upon him at Kilmany ; he was still the same earnest worker as when he set Glasgow into a ferment of Christian philanthropy ; he was still the same tender-hearted personal friend who wept over the grave of Thomas Smith. His words, his writings, and, most of all, his example, had struck new vitality through all the borders of Christian Scotland ; and now, as the glories of eventide were beginning to encircle him, he saw around him an army of young ardent spirits, who, in their pulpits, preached Christ and Him crucified, and, in the assemblies of their Church, defended her rights with an ability and a persistency which astonished every party. The sun looks proudest in the evening ; and the cause of his grandeur is, that, ere he himself sinks to rest, a thousand clouds, which his light brightens into radiance and beauty, encircle and seem to escort him : so, when a great man draws to his rest, a thousand younger men, whose fire has been kindled by him, reflect his light and testify his power.

In the beginning of the summer of 1843, Thomas Chalmers and in all nearly five hundred ministers of the Church of Scotland severed the connection which bound them to the State, relinquished every claim on its immunities, and re-constituted the Church in a state of freedom. Not abjuring the principle of an Establishment, but protesting that no Government sanction could stand in the room of that Divine authority which gave life to a Church, they parted from a Government which seemed ignorant of its nature, and claimed an authority paramount to that of its charter written by the finger of God.

The act of Chalmers and his followers requires no trumpeting, and none shall be attempted here. But it is a mere argumentative assertion, removed altogether from enthusiasm or exaggeration, that the Scottish Disruption, whatever minor opinions may be held regarding it, did evince that Christianity has a real and a powerful hold upon both the pastors and the people of Scotland in our day. I shall not insist upon much being made of this ; Scotland has little to boast of, and great cause for repentance ; but it would be a sin and a shame not to attach to it a real and august importance. In an age of respectability and commonplace,—in an age when the decorous, the established, the aristocratic, is still so revered and clung to by at least our middle classes,—a large body of men, well advanced in life, and many of them tottering under grey hairs, deliberately stepped from under the smile of power, deliberately risked their continuance as a Church, on the Christianity of the people and the blessing of God. Such events do not occur in the history of dead religions ; such phenomena cannot appear where religion is a doubt.

The whole spectacle of the Disruption, viewed in the relation borne to it by Government, is anomalous and amazing. Disencumbered of all incidental and extraneous entanglements arising from the civil rights of individuals, the power claimed by the Church of Scotland, ere demitting its endowment, was precisely that which is exercised by every Dissenting body in the kingdom, and which it at once began to exercise on parting from the State. This circumstance alone appears sufficient to Isaac Taylor to stamp the conduct of the State as impolitic ; and, though far higher grounds than his may be taken in discussing the general question, the fact involves conclusive evidence that there was no ruling British statesman of the day capable of taking a strong original look at the matter. The sovereign power of Britain tore asunder a body of known loyalty, which sat enthroned in the affection of the mass of the people of Scotland, and whose influence could not but be pronounced, on the whole, promotive of public morality, for one of two causes : either because it would not permit the Church to do what every Dissenting body does, and what this body could not when disestablished be prevented from doing ; or because there was not ability and decision in its compass sufficient to disentangle and make short work with a few beggarly questions touching money matters. From this dilemma there is no escape. Into one of two errors, or both, it seems to have been impossible for British statesmen to avoid falling : into that of fancying that the Church claimed a Popish power, that it was going to erect a spiritual despotism ; to which, remembering that we live in the nineteenth century, and that all Protestant Dissenting bodies are thus spiritual despotisms, one may decline replying, as sheer and infantile fooling : or into that of affirming the Church to be a mere State police, paid, and, by natural consequence, superintended, by Government ; which has been already shown to imply an ignorance of the very conditions of the question,—a negation of the existence of a Church.

Chalmers was now becoming an old man. On passing his sixtieth year, he entered on what he called the Sabbath of his life, six working decades past. It was a beautiful thought, and showed how his great soul yearned, like all the noble, for repose. Over the last years of his life there rests a still and pensive beauty, a soft radiance of Sabbathic calm ; not unshaded by sadness, not unbroken by agitation, they are wrapped in peace and harmony by that effect which poets ever love, the dawning, in the background, of infinite light. It was hard, with now aged limb, to leave that Establishment, from whose battlements, in the morn, and noontide, and hale afternoon of his years, he had looked with a glance of pride and satisfaction, such as lit the minstrel king's when he looked from the towers of Zion. It was, indeed, a high consolation that in Scotland there was still enough of "celestial fire" to organize and animate a free Church ; but his faith in Voluntaryism was not even yet absolute ; and the one grand idea of his life, the reaping of the great outfield, the diffusion of Christianity over all the land, seemed no longer realizable. That sadness which we saw to be characteristic of the close of the most memorable and precious lives, descended perceptibly, in the evening of his days, on the manly brow of Chalmers.

The general aspect of these years is of deep interest and instruction, and cannot but reward a few final glances.

While the member of an Established Church, the large heart of Chalmers had opened its gates to everything noble in Dissent, to receive and love it ; and now, when he was himself member of a disestablished body, his nature flung aside those constraining and cramping cords of sectarianism which seem inevitably to twine themselves, however insensibly, round men of particular parties and denominations. It was with a glow of generous and enthusiastic joy that he hailed the Evangelical Alliance ; as one in a fleet on a stormy sea, when morn was drawing on, might hail the streaks of that sun which was to extinguish the lamp in each separate vessel. And with a fearless and truly Christian cosmopolitanism, he threw out his sympathies in other directions. He earnestly accepted a contribution towards the cause of humanity, whencesoever it came. He could stand immoveable in his own belief, and yet hear words of instruction or monition from others whose opinions were widely apart from his : he could rest in his belief that Christianity, that the preaching of Christ crucified, could alone regenerate the world ; and yet he could hear, in the words of Mr Carlyle, the voice of God to the Churches, proclaiming that their indifference and their dormancy had left a breach to the enemy.

What a stirring gleam of Christian valour, too, in that determination, old as he was, to master German philosophy ! He is not the man to be afraid ; he will enter this untrodden region ; if any new seed, or fruit, or flower of truth has been found, he must know and possess it ; if any new form of error has appeared, he must go, like a brave and faithful son, to set it, yet another trophy, on Truth's immortal brow !

His intellect was now calm, comprehensive, sage ; his heart was fresh as with the dew of youth. He again read Shakspeare, Milton, and Gibbon. His re-perusal of the first of these furnishes a beautiful and characteristic trait. After a life of continual effort, of perpetual contact with men and things, after the world had done its worst upon him, both in applause and in censure, he still revelled in the aerial gaiety, the many-tinted summer-like beauty, the genial, though keen sagacity, of Midsummer's Night's Dream. Of Shakspeare's plays, that was his favourite. It is a very remarkable circumstance ; telling of a gentleness of nature, a kind gleesome humour, an exuberant unstrained force and freshness of intellect, surely rare among theologians. As kindred to this, and of still deeper beauty, we may regard his tender playful affection for his infant grandson. He writes to little Tommy with the perfect sympathy of one whom the world has still left guileless as a child ; he relates little anecdotes for his amusement ; tells him of birds' nests ; demonstrates to him, with syllogistic conclusiveness, that it is a logical mistake to love his hobbyhorse better than his grandpapa, merely because the former is "biggest ;" he does not forget to send him toys when at a distance, he makes him feel himself quite a man as he stands beside grandpapa assisting him to range his books ; and, best of all, he leads him, by kind, winning, imperceptible ways, to the footstool of their common Father. The child of four, and the veteran of three-score, kneel down together alone, that the smile of God may light on both His children !

There is one negative characteristic which appears to be constant in men deserving to be called, in any right sense, great. They are perfectly free of knowingness ; of the light-sniffing, nil admirari mood, that trembles at the thought of a sneer ; they are more simple than other men. This was signally the case with Chalmers.

It is by looking at the inner life of Chalmers, at his walk with God, that we come to know and understand him. It is by knowing well what he was in his closet, that we can explain what he was in the world of men. The three reverences that figure so largely in Goethe's system were all found there ; with this difference, that the word and feeling of reverence were applied to no finite being, but only to the Infinite God. The "trust thyself" of Emerson, that "iron string to which every heart vibrates," was never shown in any better than in him ; but it was held, not as the whole truth, but as half of the truth, which could never become the whole. It was the self-trust of humility, not of pride ; it was the trust that knew the world, hanging, as it seems, on nothing, to be yet upheld by the hand of God ; it was the trust which felt nothing finite worthy to be feared, since a chord of love bound its possessor eternally to the very heart of God. He trusted himself ; as David, Paul, Luther, Cromwell, trusted ; but it was among the finite he did so ; before his God he lay low. He trusted himself to face the world, but not to scale the universe. Christianity has furnished a greater number of courageous, iron-built men, than either philosophy or any religion besides itself can show ; but the sternest and greatest of them bowed the head to the Highest. Christianity leaves no place for cowardice, while it blasts the eye of pride. Chalmers was a man of prayer ; he was much alone with God. And how much is included in this assertion ! Did the world shout and adulate ? Its voice became silent and of little moment when the inner chambers of the heart were flung open before the eye of God, searching into the recesses of the soul, casting a ray of celestial pureness, in whose light motes, else invisible, were seen. Did the world rage and scorn ? Its frown became of small importance in the smile of God, its rage and tumult of slight avail, if the voice that called order out of chaos said, "Let there be light." The hallowing influence of habitual prayer pervaded his whole life ; to comfort in adversity, to strengthen in toil, to cheer in battle, to sober in victory. Humble yet courageous, weak yet strong, he saw himself filled with human frailty and human faults, yet he shone before the eyes of men.

The deep sagacity which had been ripening during a lifetime was true and sure at its quiet close. "The public is just a big baby !" What a profound and deliberate knowledge of society is here. And what a comparison ! A big baby ! a great, pulpy, lumbering thing, that could do nothing but squall ! Yet how he grasped to his heart any really noble and godly man ; even with a kiss, as Tholuck said in amazement ! The true individual soul, and the real hidden work, were still what he dearly loved. From the glare of observation he shrunk aside ; but you might have seen him in Burke's Close, in the West Port, at his old work, bringing Heaven's light into the hovel and the heart of the poor.

tian man. He showed how Christianity embraces and ennobles, but does not cramp or curtail, humanity ; how, in that Divine influence, all old things do indeed pass away, but leave no desert behind, for a fairer verdure springs, beautified by immortal flowers, and nourished from living fountains, in an inner world where all things have become new. The vital warmth which would pervade a system of society really Christian, can be but counterfeited and galvanically mimicked by worldliness ; Christianity extends her claim and dominion over everything, if it have the one characteristic of being good. From the breast of Chalmers all the counterfeits of worldliness were banished, but the goodly company of healthful human emotions, of noble human attributes, entered in their stead. The cold affectations, the hypocritic smiles, the mellifluous falsehood, the greedy complaisance, all the glitter by which fashion hides her heart of ice, never found any point of adherence in him ; but the manly and genial deference of true politeness, a politeness based on the essential equality in the sight of God of "all human souls," was truly his ; to peer and peasant he was the same self-respecting yet truly modest and courteous man,—no touch of trepidation, no tone of flattery, towards the one ; no "insolence of condescension," no patronizing blandness, towards the other. He loved genial mirth and a deep hearty laugh ; the simper of etiquette, the giggle of frivolity, were alike alien to his nature.

It is well, likewise, to remember, that his heart was ever kept warm and fresh by those gentle ministries which nature has appointed, and Christianity, of course, sanctions : by the tender influences of home, by the wife of his bosom, and the children whom God had given him. These are nature's general means, and doubtless they are, in general, the best, to preserve health in the whole system of thought, of feeling, and of action. The man who plays for an hour or two at bowls with his children, as his elder found Chalmers doing, will not likely, with Godwin or any other, fabricate for you a world on philosophic principles, with ice figures going by clockwork for men, and painted in the highest style of art. Follow the ecclesiastic, or professor, from the debate or the conclave, into his own home ; there see him, in his warm arm-chair, with his three daughters near him, one shampooing his feet, another talking the sort of nonsense which she knows will set him into fits of laughter, and the third making up the perfect harmony, by playing the tunes of dear old Scotland ; can you apprehend narrowness or fanaticism in that man ? Will not that laugh shake out of the heart every taint of theological rancour, lift from the brow every shade of gloom, express that unromantic, unostentatious, unspeakable comfort, which fills a really Christian home ? These are drops of sweetness instilled into the very fountain of the life ; no wonder that the streams are clear, and musical, and bordered with flowers.

Those combinations in which nature most cunningly displays her power, and which give the rare and excelling character, were variously represented by Chalmers ; his mind was rarely complete and symmetrical. An eye to see, a voice to speak, an arm to do : few men have had all three as Chalmers. The strength that can stand alone ; the social sympathy that plants little grappling gold-hooks of love in all surrounding hearts : the receptive faculty to grasp the thoughts of others, to sift them, to compare them, to mete their power of light to reveal truth and of lightning to blast error, to make the world an armoury ; the independent and original energy by which nevertheless the character acts freely and naturally : the power of saying, deliberately and irreversibly, No ; the tenderness that often wept : reverence towards God, respect towards man, love towards all :—you can assert for him each of these.

consideration in the elimination of character. It seems, as was before remarked, a providential arrangement that hope generally prevails in the noblest and greatest minds. Chalmers was sunny in his whole nature. Fear plays a very slight part in his mental or external history. It had a small share in his conversion ; it was rather the conviction that the remedy needed for the world was deeper than he had formerly deemed,—that the holiness without which a man cannot see God was something above the virtue of philosophy,—which led to that great change. And in all his works there are cheerfulness, hope, courage,—no touch of despondency or misanthropy. Yet his mind was of no flimsy, romantic cast. He knew the world to be a stern reality, with ribs of rock and veins of iron, not to be softened and tamed into perpetual mildness and docility, by poet, pedant, or philosopher. He had enough of hope to make him work cheerfully and indefatigably ; he had enough of fear, of soberness and apprehension, to avert despair at the results of his work.

As justice, verity, temperance, stableness,
Bounty, perseverance, mercy, lowliness, Devotion, patience, courage, fortitude,” were all in some measure his ; and in him they flowed from the only Source from which they can flow in strength and purity.

To give his radical characteristic in one word, Chalmers was, as man and as thinker, a great mass of common sense. He had a giant's grasp of the fundamental facts of man's existence, an inborn notion how this world is put together ; he was not the man to build you metaphysical palaces, mist skillfully tinted by moonshine, or to lead you, with clear small safety-lamp, through argumentative mazes ; but he had a profound consciousness of those unseen principles by which men actually live and work ; he was a man against whom a nation might lean. To use a comparison applied by himself in the

And his books, which it is unnecessary to review, are distinguished in a manner correspondent to this. They were now round him in many substantial volumes, and more were to be given to the world after his death. They embodied that grand idea which lent sublimity to his life, the union of humanity with Christianity, the omnipotence, in the man and in the nation, of the gospel of Jesus. He is the king of practical theologians. Those books do not abound with learned disquisitions or erudite quotations ; but they take bold, broad views of man and his salvation, and they burn all over with the blended fire of lofty human emotion and lowly Christian faith. If you do not find in them the delicacies of a minute ingenuity, or the meagre exactness of logical formula, you meet with those great ideas which may be called the key ideas in systems of religion, ethics, and polity ; with which, if your hand is not specially weak, you can solve, far and wide, the practical problems of life. It has been objected that they are filled with iteration, and their style has often been called declamatory. There is doubtless something in the charges. But it should be remembered that Chalmers was by instinct an enforcer, a preacher of truth ; he would fling thunderbolt on thunderbolt, till he sent one fairly home ; he looked upon what he delivered, not so much as something for its own sake to be demonstrated, as what was to tell on the public mind, and be impressed upon it with that view. He wrote with the sound of the world in his ears ; every one of his books seems anchored to earth.

At last his earthly Sabbath came to an end. He had been in London, giving evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons. His intellect, as this evidence testifies, was still clear and strong ; and in private he was the same quiet but genial and hearty man that he had ever been. He visited

Mr Carlyle, and the two extraordinary Scotchmen had an acquiescing and cordial conversation, with "a great deal of laughing on both sides." He returned to Edinburgh about the time when the Assembly of the Free Church met ; on Friday, May 28, 1847.

On the Sabbath evening that followed, he was more than usually benignant and genial ; but a cloud might be seen to flit across his features, and, walking in the garden, he was heard, in low but very earnest tones, saying, "O Father, my Heavenly Father !" His general aspect, however, was one of cheerful and genial composure.

Next day, the May morning rose over Arthur Seat, and the Castle rock, and the spires and palaces of that lordly city which he loved so well. Men rose bustling after the Sunday rest, and the conversation in town would turn largely on the doings of the two Assemblies, and the appearance he was to make that day. But, as the hours wore on, a whisper stole over the city, stopping for a moment every breath : Chalmers was dead. One had entered his room in the morning, and found him motionless : "he sat there, half erect, his head reclining gently on his pillow ; the expression of his countenance that of fixed and majestic repose." The land mourned for him, as Judah and Israel mourned for the good kings of old.

CONCLUSION.

CONCLUSION.

ONLY a few words require to be added. I shall consider it made good in the foregoing pages, that Christianity still retains power to breathe a healing balm into social and individual life : and I shall now endeavour briefly to indicate in what precise position it at present stands, and how it is capable, as in every age, of drawing around it all the real enlightenment of the time, and going on to ever nobler manifestation and wider conquest.

Reference has already been made to the remark of Goethe, that "thought widens but lames ;" that it is a natural law and tendency that the intensity of belief be in an inverse ratio to its range. If we examine well the religious phenomena of the middle ages, we shall find them characterized indeed by strength ; but it was a strength that owed much to narrowness on the one hand, and superstition on the other. History has now, so to speak, lifted the roof from each nation and from each generation, showing the many families that dwell under the common blue, the many generations within one cycle of time ; astronomy has opened up the heavens around the arrogating earth, and compelled it to dwindle from the central sun of the universe, with all the orbs circling round it, to a puny and planetary ball : the Reformation shattered the vast and icy crystallization of Popery, and since then the tongue of controversy has never been silent ; the mass of men must now have a far wider range of ideas than in former ages. A proportionate lessening of intensity is the necessary result. Is it, however, to be impossible that the faith of a narrow intensity may be exchanged for that of an intelligent knowledge, which difference can no longer startle, and novelty no longer imperil ? Is it impossible that it attain a noble and manly composure, and a calmness of spiritual strength, which can distinguish between opinions and opinions, so as not to condemn good with bad, and between opinions and men, so as to tolerate and love the one, while opposing and exterminating the other ? To mourn over the old intensity is weak ; to recoil into scepticism and the universal unsoldering of belief, is a cowardly and feeble proceeding : to be religious without superstition, to be enlightened yet not infidel, is the aim which may now be formed.

Indecision and a spurious toleration are reigning temptations of the day. "As far," says Coleridge, "as opinions and not motives, principles and not men, are concerned, I neither am tolerant, nor wish to be regarded as such." "That which doth not withstand, hath itself no standing place." And again, quoting from Leighton :—"Toleration is an herb of spontaneous growth in the soil of indifference ; but the weed has none of the virtues of the medicinal plant reared by humility in the garden of zeal." We cannot too carefully remember that, if controversy is the sign of an imperfect development, or distempered action, of life, indifference, whether in philosophy or religion, is death. The history of toleration in modern European progress exhibits three stages. First, there was the deep and universal sleep of Paganism ; the throne of toleration stood immoveable under the canopy of the ancient night. Then, for long Christian ages, there continued the reign of intolerance ; and, with all its gloom, this new phenomenon may be joyfully hailed as the indication of a mighty advancement made by the human mind, as a proof of the implantation, in the heart and intellect of the race, of the conviction that belief is important enough to be measured against the physical life : in this one consideration there is force to turn into a beacon of promise every fire which persecution has lighted since the commencement of the Christian era. A third and noblest epoch of toleration has now become possible. It is that during which truth, having absolutely and for ever relinquished the ministry of pain, may yet continue to be loved and followed with devotion equal to that of the olden time, when Earnestness and Intolerance, two austere Spartan kings, exercised joint sovereignty. The grand peril is that men, shaking themselves free of the middle-age intolerance, lapse into that indifference to all spiritual things which Christianity at first dispelled. It is at present the peculiar and urgent duty of every brave man to witness to the unity, the definite clearness, the indestructible life, the perpetual value, of truth ; to manifest his unwavering conviction that, though a thousand arrows fly wide, the mark is stable and eternal ; that, though every voice of a discord, like that in the cave of Æolus, proclaim that its error is truth, truth itself is immoveable and immortal, rising in sublime indifference amid the conflict of opinion, like a pyramid in the midst of desert sands, the same whether assented to by no finite intellect, or with all the languages of men blended in one indivisible tone to chant its praise. And it is not to be disguised that the attitude of Christianity has in no age been that of compromise. It has been like a fiery sword, going up and down among the nations, searching, separating, startling. It has never striven to show the similarity of error to truth, or to attempt a patchwork alliance between them. Any such attempt must come to nought ; and it should be seriously laid to heart by all how deadly is the injury which may be inflicted by erring friendship, or a rash zeal that cannot wait. There have been many arguments adduced to prove that Judas, in coming to the Pharisees to bargain for the betrayal of his Lord, may not actually have intended His death ; that it is a possibility his motive was but to force on the manifestation of the kingdom of Jesus : and whether we are convinced by such arguments or no, they contain profound suggestion for us of these latter ages. Let us beware how we serve the Lord, even with a kiss !

It does not seem difficult to point to the precise tower of the strength of Christianity, to that position whose abandonment is the final yielding up of victory. There is in the present day a vast deal of confounding babble about book revelations. We must look for some source of calming and ordering light to impart coherence and definiteness to our ideas of revelation, inspiration, and all kindred subjects. We find such a source, and we reach the ultimate fortress of Christian evidence, when we consider what, strictly speaking, the Christian Revelation is. It is the Revelation of a Person : it is the manifestation of Jesus Christ. All Revelation before His advent is the radiance that heralds the dawn : all Revelation after His advent is the shedding on the world of the risen Light. Let me once stand among His audience in Judea, once believe that He raises the dead, that He is from God, and all becomes clear. Out of His lips I hear the words,—“The Scripture cannot be broken :” the words are clearly distinguished ; there is no variety of reading : history hears the words. What must I say on this ? What He means by Scripture is an open question ; but that, if what He does indicate by the expression can be broken, His word is broken with it, cannot be open to dispute. I listen further ; I hear Him utter these words :—“Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in nowise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.” Here, again, I ask history what Christ means by the law ; but I must, in the meanwhile, grant that a stronger declaration of the supernatural character of a certain writing so named could not be framed. What now becomes of all the jargon about a book revelation? Can I believe Jesus without believing His words? And I find that these are not exceptional words, but that in many forms, and on many occasions, He utters similar. I cannot fail to perceive in Him a fixed habit of regarding a certain body of writings as authoritative in matters of doctrine, and supernatural in respect of foresight. I note also that there accompany Him twelve men; that He sends them out to preach miraculously endowed; that He says to them expressly, "He that receiveth you receiveth me." I hear Him promise them the "Holy Ghost," in these words:—"But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." This, I must admit, seems an explicit promise of exemption from error in things connected with the teaching of the gospel. Last of all, I watch Him in the midst of His disciples after His resurrection, and once more hear these words:—"Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you, and ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." As I see Him received into the cloud, and vanishing towards heaven, can I doubt any longer that He has left trustworthy apostles of His doctrines?—can I turn away from the witnesses whom He has expressly commissioned? If I can repose absolute confidence in the declaration and promise of the Saviour, my future inquiries are limited to the discovery of that "Scripture" which He said could not be broken, and that testimony which His commissioned "witnesses" bore. Confirmatory evidence may arise from many quarters, but this is the centre towards which all must converge. And let it be recollected that, in order to this result, no aid is required except that of history, of unaided human faculty, and (by hypothesis) of uninspired human knowledge : we ascend the mount with our natural limbs, but we reach a station where we can see the hand of God tracing characters in celestial light.

Christ and Christianity thus bring us to the Bible. Coleridge says, touching that Book :—

“In every generation, and wherever the light of Revelation has shone, men of all ranks, conditions, and states of mind, have found in this volume a correspondent for every movement toward the Better felt in their own hearts. The needy soul has found supply, the feeble a help, the sorrowful a comfort ; yea, be the reciprocity the least that can consist with moral life, there is an answering grace ready to enter. The Bible has been found a spiritual world,—spiritual, and yet at the same time outward and common to all. You in one place, I in another,—all men somewhere, or at some time, meet with an assurance that the hopes and fears, the thoughts and yearnings, that proceed from, or tend to, a right spirit in us, are not dreams or fleeting singularities, no voices heard in sleep, or spectres which the eye suffers, but not perceives. As if on some dark night, a pilgrim, suddenly beholding a bright star moving before him, should stop in fear and perplexity. But lo ! traveller after traveller passes by him, and each, being questioned whither he is going, makes answer, ‘I am following yon guiding Star !’ The pilgrim quickens his own steps, and presses onward in confidence. More confident still will he be, if by the wayside he should find, here and there, ancient monuments, each with its votive lamp, and on each the name of some former pilgrim, and a record that there he had first seen or begun to follow the benignant Star !

“No otherwise is it with the varied contents of the sacred volume. The hungry have found food, the thirsty a living spring, the feeble a staff, and the victorious warfarer songs of welcome and strains of music ; and as long as each man asks on account of his wants, and asks what he wants, no man will discover aught amiss or deficient in the vast and many-chambered storehouse.

“ For more than a thousand years the Bible, collectively taken, has gone hand in hand with civilization, science, law, —in short, with the moral and intellectual cultivation of the species,—always supporting, and often leading the way. Its very presence, as a believed Book, has rendered the nations emphatically a chosen race, and this, too, in exact proportion as it is more or less generally known and studied. Of those nations which in the highest degree enjoy its influences, it is not too much to affirm that the differences, public and private, physical, moral, and intellectual, are only less than what might be expected from a diversity in species. Good and holy men, and the best and wisest of mankind, the kingly spirits of history, enthroned in the hearts of mighty nations, have borne witness to its influences, have declared it to be beyond compare the most perfect instrument, the only adequate organ of Humanity.”

These beautiful sentences will not fail to recall to many the tones and touches of glowing eulogy of the Scriptures scattered over the works of Mr Carlyle ; and it were no difficult task to give actual realization to the assertion in the concluding clause, by appending an extended list of those mighty intellects which in all ages have recognised an individual greatness and sublimity in this strange Book. It is encompassed, all must concede, with a mystery and ancient grandeur which set it alone among the phenomena of time, and will cause any sober and thoughtful man to approach it with a feeling akin to awe. Gradually beaming forth, in the infancy of the race, ere the dawn of history, and reaching meridian splendour over the manger of Bethlehem, this Revelation of the Word seems to possess a unity, measured by time, bridging the two eternities between which it lies, and over the whole stormy history of mankind casting a soft rainbow splendour, a mild, heaven-lit radiance of infinite hope. Men and nations, at least as great as ever figured in the annals of the world, have not merely prized it, but held that its light is, by nature, alone ; that it is diverse from aught that can be attributed to the action of those faculties belonging to man in his present state as a species ; that it could no more have been the production of a Shakspeare or a Newton, than of a child ; that it came even from Him who hung the stars and ranged the galaxies, in mercy to a world in spiritual night, lying under the mysterious eclipse of sin. The destinies of humanity are bound up with that Book !

The Word of God suggests His works. We have noted, in some measure, the general action and influence upon men of a physical science in league with atheism. But the proximity of darkness can never defile light, the fact that knowledge has been made the minister of evil can never absolve us from the responsibility of making it the handmaid of good. Our God made the world : every discovery of its treasures, every revelation of its beauty, ought to be marked by Christians with a sacred interest. It is a sublime and suggestive thought of Thomas de Quincey's, that it was only at the Reformation that Christendom began rightly to decipher and understand the oracles of God. It is nowise inconceivable, that modern science may bear a commission to shed a light upon these oracles which will deserve the name of another Reformation. Even as it is, science has done much. It has widened vastly the conceptions of all enlightened men touching the power and the working of God. The astronomic scheme of the heavens, which satisfied the mind of Milton, and which he has lighted up with a radiance never to fade in the temple of his immortal song, is now known assuredly to bear no more proportion to that limitless immensity where dwells the Almighty, and where the unnumbered worlds He has willed into being float like a little cloud of light, than the orrery of a school-boy to the conception of the mighty poet. Almost strangely, too, and certainly in accordance with no presage or expectation, physical science has, in our own day, thrown a light of spirituality over the page of inspiration, bringing out a radiance thereon hitherto unseen, and touching with golden fire certain of the dogmas of an iron theology. It has shown that death existed in the world ere the fall, thus turning perforce the attention of men to the nature of that death entailed upon man by sin, suggesting the question of the difference between the death which can pass upon an animal and that which can affect a spirit, and opening up vast fields of lofty and noble speculation regarding the complete and healthful nature of man, whether original or to be restored. Science has certainly opened the minds of men to perceive a deeper significance than hitherto recognised in the words of our Saviour, which declare that what He said to His disciples was "spirit and life." And if it has enabled us more clearly to discern what was the past sentence and what is the present curse, it casts also a fainter but still most precious ray into the far future of punishment and reward.

It is not necessary to pursue this subject further. I shall merely remark, that apprehension on the part of Christians with reference to science is, in all respects, causeless, unreasonable, and absurd. To suppose that truth and God can be severed, is blasphemy. To refuse to accept the ascertained doctrines of science on behalf of revelation, is to cut away the foundation in order to save the house. The attitude of Christians towards science should be that of calm and earnest waiting. The Word of God stands on its own basis; its foot on the rock foundations of the earth, its head reaching unto heaven. Science, too, stands on its own basis, stable as the faculties by which men grasp truth, and waxing in these times towards colossal dimensions. Even now it were surely an assertion far removed from extravagance, that it has done more for revelation than it has even seemed to do against it ; pointing back to an original revelation with marvellous distinctness, and showing a correspondence between the Bible's theory of humanity and the truths of induction, which can hardly by any man be imputed to unassisted reason. But even supposing science to have disturbed that rest of ignorance which she cannot yet recompose into the peace and strength, the repose and majesty, of perfect knowledge, cannot Christians wait ? Truth must cast light upon truth ! Christianity is not to abandon her old position in the van of civilization, her old attitude of proud and challenging defiance to all adversaries ; she is not to lag ignominiously behind the race, entreating only not to be forced to a combat. Science is yet far from its meridian. It may take even centuries before its several subordinate lights blend their rays to cast a common illumination ; but is it too much to predict that, when science shall have filled its orb, it will be seen by all nations that the Father of spirits has had a higher design regarding it than that of spreading man's table or shortening his path, and that it casts a light, to reveal and demonstrate, over every pillar, down every avenue and colonnade, into every nook and crevice, of His Word ? "Wait on the Lord ; be of good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart : wait, I say, on the Lord."

"My faith," says De Quincey again, "my faith is, that, though a great man may, by a rare possibility, be an infidel, an intellect of the highest order must build upon Christianity." It is a reasonable and manly faith. Christianity gives to man the immoveable assurance of the Word of the eternal God for all those verities which are his glory and sublimity. While atheism, speaking great swelling words, would have him make his bed in the dust, and would spread over the universe that wan and desolate look which the home of his infancy wears to the orphan that returns from his father's closing grave, Christianity gives him the certainty of a spiritual existence, and a Creating Father. And it shows that Father manifesting His love in a manner whose very greatness wraps it in mystery : He is a God not far away, but brought nigh in Christ Jesus. While a vaguely aspiring and haughty spiritualism would cast over the future heavens a general indefinite illumination, or a sublime but melancholy darkness, it pictures out the future of humanity, not, indeed, in detailed minuteness, but with such a defined and comprehensible clearness, that hallowed musing, aided by the sovereign imagination in its highest mood, may clearly distinguish certain of its great features, may breathe the unbroken serenity of the cloudless light, and gaze reverent on the fadeless crown. It can indicate, though faintly,

“ Those high offices that suit

it can guarantee the eternity of friendship, and of that love which is the friendship of spirits. It opens up, also, the prospect of an inspiring futurity for earth ; it sheds an auroral splendour over even the terrestrial destiny of man. The allusion is not to the millennial epoch, irreversible as the promise of such an epoch is ; it is to the power of Christianity to develop and ennoble the whole character of man ; and this grand peculiarity Christianity has, that it makes this development and this ennobling sacred duties ; that it tells a man that neither his faculties nor their sphere of operation are his ; that he has to subdue the whole kingdom, and cultivate the whole garden of his soul for God, and must not rest, save in the peace that is the music of work, until the limits also of God's outer kingdom of the world enclose the whole earth. Where faith is firm, it must impart a steadfastness, an earnest composure, a dignity, to the whole man. A man must be affected by his sense of his position and responsibilities : he assuredly, whatever his abilities, and whatever his sphere, who knows himself to be a soldier in God's army, will possess elements of strength and contentment to distinguish him among men. Shall we not agree with these words spoken by Edwards in reference to the fruits of Christianity ?—" Now, if such things are enthusiasm, and the fruits of a distempered brain, let my brain be evermore possessed of the happy distemper ! If this be distraction, I pray God that the world of mankind may be all seized with this benign, meek, beneficent, beatifical, glorious distraction !"

Christianity can at least, and surely with no need of argument, affirm that it possesses a practical worth and power beyond any other system. The idea of world-history is not philosophy, but faith. It is an old doctrine, which yet, like the forgetting of it, must ever be new, that to demonstrate and promulgate a truth is not to enforce it : to establish it in the heart and life of man, to set it by the ploughman in the furrow, with the sailor on the ocean, with the artisan in the workshop, by the household fire, and in the brawling marketplace, it must have capacity to lay its hand on the instincts that lie deep and half-conscious in the bosom. The religious instinct is perhaps the deepest and most powerful of all ; no agency will produce a great impression, or effect a permanent lodgment in the world, that admits not of being leagued with it ; and if it has now become a pre-eminent duty of the race to unite science and general education with religion, it may be argued that if the race is really to bestir itself to effect its thorough education, education must come with the sanction and enforcement of religion. Neither must be left to stand alone. A people with the religious instinct strongly developed, yet unenlightened by education, is like a giant smitten blind, who rushes wildly on, impelled by some resistless force, but towards no definite or noble goal ; an enlightened, an educated nation, without religion, is like a skeleton bearing a lamp ; it has light but not force. And if a superstitious nation, spreading its religion at the sword-point, or burning imaginary devotees of the prince of darkness, is a sad and dismal spectacle, it yet has elements of real life and human strength with which we can sympathise ; while there is something to excite an utter loathing in the aspect of a nation possessed of no earnestness above that of the market-place, no temple more sacred than the studio, and for which life has become one immeasurable galvanic simper of theatricality and art. And let it once more be called to mind, that superstition or licentiousness will never be long asleep. On the deck of the vessel they may be dancing to soft artistic music, or rejoicing in the dainties of a scientific luxury ; but meanwhile the fire of superstition is smouldering in the hold, erewhile to wrap it in flames, or the ship draws near some endless bank of fucus and sea-weed, into which, when it once sails, it makes no further progress, but rots away amid foul odours, on a sea where no wind blows.

THE END.

WORKS BY PETER BAYNE, A.M.

Lately published, price 7s. 6d.,

ESSAYS ; BIOGRAPHICAL, CRITICAL, and MISCELLANEOUS.

“ They indicate the traits of mind and heart which render ‘ The Christian Life ’ so intensely suggestive and vitalizing, and at the same time display a critical power seldom equalled in comprehensiveness, depth of insight, candid appreciation, and judicial integrity. The author enters at once into the heart of his subject ; his standards of judgment are never lost from sight, or warped in their application to the case in hand ; and his verdicts appear, not as the result of individual caprice, but as justified by the clear and full statement of the grounds on which they are pronounced.”—North American Review.

“ The names that appeal to all the deepest and dearest sympathies of Christian people are not to be met in the ‘ Essays,’ as in ‘ The Christian Life.’ And many good and most estimable people will feel as if passing beyond the family circle, with all its hallowed associations and sympathies, when, for Chalmers, Wilberforce, and Howard, and other worthies of the Christian Church, they are introduced to Tennyson, and Mrs Browning, and Turner, and Ruskin ; and all the conversation is to be, not as formerly, of religion and philanthropy, but of art, and literature, and criticism. But let them have patience. The scene and company may have changed, but their companion and guide remains the same. For Mr Bayne, Christianity is not a thing to be put on merely when speaking about religion : it is—(we speak of him as an author, for we have not the pleasure of knowing the man)—it is an inner life diffused through all his life, that is with him in the fields of literature and galleries of art, not less, or at least not less truly, than in the Church. It is not an altar-fire seen only in the temple ; it is heaven’s own blessed light, in which every thing else is seen and judged.”—Ayr Advertiser.

“ We are not acquainted with any writer who possesses an equal power of presenting in a brief compass the events and characteristics of a life with vividness and force. . . . The article on the ‘ Elementary Principles of Criticism ’ is one of the most admirable essays in the language. . . . The paper on Mrs

Browning is the best introduction to her poetry we have. . . . The admirers of Mr Tennyson will not fail to thank Mr Bayne for his article on their favourite. . . . No attempt which has yet been made to estimate the genius of the Laureate approaches this in thorough appreciation of his intellectual power and artistic perfection, or in the eloquence and subtle beauty of the style."—Patriot.

"There is yet room for some steps being taken to reconcile, in its highest forms, literature with religion. We hope and believe that Mr Bayne has peculiar qualifications for this task, and we cordially welcome his book as an important contribution towards its achievement."—British and Foreign Evangelical Review.

"Men of ripe intellect and varied information will be readiest to bear testimony to the great ability displayed in them."—North British Review.

"The volume is one in which, like a mirror, we may contemplate the age wherein we live."—The Leader.

"Such a work would suffice to settle the character of any writer. The essays on Wellington and Napoleon, to mention none other, are of a very high order. . . . They present lessons of thinking, examples of analysis, patterns of moral delineation, of no common excellence. The same observations apply to the other essays ; those on Criticism and the Arts are singularly beautiful."—British Standard.

"The essays in the last part of the volume are critiques, not dissertations. The elementary principles of criticism are laid down. The productions of the author in hand tested by these principles, the morality of the work estimated, and extracts given in illustration—all these we have admirably laid down. None since Lord Jeffrey has adopted this mode (it is the best mode), and executed it so well as Mr Peter Bayne.—Ayrshire Express.
